Russia's Jews brace for trouble

Renewed anti-Semitism feared

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As Russia suffers through its latest bout of political and economic convulsions, Jews in the former Soviet Union are bracing for possible repercussions, immigrant and advocacy groups here report.

Officials with the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS) returned recently from an 11-day fact-finding mission to Russia and Ukraine, "deeply concerned" about the state of religious protection in the former Soviet Union.

And Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) is watching developments carefully, prepared for more community-sponsored immigrants months down the road.

Even before President Boris Yeltsin's surprise shift in cabinet personnel, including the sudden reinstatement of former prime minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, the ruble's drastic devaluation in recent days prompted HIAS executive vice-president Leonard Glickman to call Russia's environment "a breeding ground for anti-democratic and anti-Semitic forces."

In meetings in Ukraine and Russia with Jews from Vinnitsa to Moscow, the officials heard the same message: Despite advances on the human rights front in the region, there is still a great deal of uncertainty and fear.

Prof. Aurel Braun, a University of Toronto expert on Russia and its Jews, agrees, warning that current upheavals could lead to a "toxic mix" of anti-Semitism from both the far right and the communists.

Any period of extreme uncertainty and turmoil leads to renewed anti-Semitism, Braun told The CJN on Monday.

New diary pages appear

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telgraphic Agency

LONDON — The publication of new excerpts of Anne Frank's diary has triggered threats of possible legal action.

The threats come after a leading Dutch newspaper, Het Parool, reproduced what it claimed were excerpts from five missing pages of the famous diary of Anne Frank, the Dutch teenager who died of typhus in Bergen-Belsen after the Nazis discovered her family's hiding place in an Amsterdam attic.

The missing pages, which were suppressed by Anne's father, Otto, the only member of the family who survived the Holocaust, contain critical comments by Anne about her parents' relationship.

Pierre Loewe of the Swiss-based Anne Frank Fund, which owns the copyright to the diaries, warned that "the case is in the hands of our lawyers."

Het Parool's deputy editor, Frits Campagne, responded by saying, "We think the whole subject is news, and there is no copyright on news. If they send their lawyers, we will ask our lawyers to answer them."

Anne Frank's legacy

Otto Frank, who died in 1980, is understood to have given the missing pages to a family friend, Cor Suijk, as a gift, but it is not known how the excerpts were passed on to Het Parool.

Suijk, a former employee of the Dutch-based Anne Frank Foundation, has demanded that proceeds from publication of the pages go to the Anne Frank Centre U.S.A. in New York, where he now works.

According to David Barnouw of the Netherlands State Institute for War Documentation, Otto Frank wanted the contents of the missing pages to remain private.

When the diaries were published in 1947, he is believed to have deleted significant sections of her entries, including negative remarks Anne made about friends who had hidden with the Frank family and later perished in the Holocaust.

At the request of the Catholic publishing house in the Netherlands that first printed the diaries, he is also believed to have deleted what were then considered explicit sexual passages.

Three years ago, a "definitive version" of the diaries, including

CANADA

Survivors To Gather

MONTREAL — The World Federation of Jewish Fighters, Partisans and Camp Inmates will gather in Tel Aviv for a conference Oct. 13 to 15. Topics on the agenda are neo-Nazism, Holocaust remembrance and restitution claims. For details, contact Dan Tours of Canada at 905-886-9769.

Survivors Sought

OTTAWA — The federal government and national Jewish organizations are seeking Holocaust survivors to be honored at a ceremony here in November. Fifty survivors will be honored for contributing to Canadian society, as a way of commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Nominations may be faxed or mailed by Sept. 11 to: Zachor Adjudication Committee, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, 970 Lawrence Ave., Toronto, M6A 3B6; fax: 416-785-4536.

Science Buffs Return

MONTREAL — Twenty-two young science whizzes from Canada and the United States have returned from Israel after competing in this year's Olympiyeda – Israel's prestigious international science contest for ninth and tenth graders.

The top-scoring teens each received a three-week paid stay at a summer science camp in Israel last month after being selected from some 300 applicants through a series of elimination exams.

Two Canadians were among the top scorers: Sagi Kaduri, 15, of Montreal's Herzliya High School; and Leonard Karp-Friedman, 15, of Bialik High School, also in Montreal.

ISRAEL

Economy Slowing Down

JERUSALEM — Signs of an economic slowdown are mounting in Israel. No rise was recorded in industrial production in the first half of this year, and according to the Central Bureau of Statistics, industrial growth will be 2.5 percent this year. The figure was particularly alarming in view of the latest unemployment figures, which showed another rise, to a rate of 9.4 percent, meaning that nearly one Israeli adult out of 10 is unemployed.

Despite the figures, Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman said there would be no change in the government's economic policy.

Assassination Plot

JERUSALEM — Israel tried to brainwash a Palestinian to assassinate Yasser Arafat in 1968, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported. The newspaper, which cited only one intelligence source for the story, said the plot had been inspired by the movie The Manchurian Candidate, in which a captured U.S. soldier is brainwashed by Chinese communists to become an assassin.

Army To Build Fences

JERUSALEM — Israel's army is reportedly planning to erect fences around 20 West Bank settlements. The plan came following intelligence assessments that Hamas militants have targeted Jewish settlers. Army leaves were cancelled and tanks were placed on alert in anticipation of attacks on settlements.

Youths Celebrate Accord

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of Israeli, Palestinian, Jordanian and Lebanese youths celebrated the fifth anniversary of the Oslo accords in the Jordanian town of Naharayim last week, defying a government ban on Israelis taking part.

WORLD

Kohl Rejects Reparations

BERLIN — German Chancellor Helmut Kohl last week rejected a proposal by German companies to create a new joint Holocaust fund. Federal coffers are firmly shut to any more reparations payments stemming from the Nazi era, Kohl said. Germany has paid more than $55.5 billion since the end of World War II in various forms of Holocaust compensation.

Papon's Request Denied

PARIS — France rejected the demands of convicted Nazi collaborator Maurice Papon that the state pay his court costs. Papon, who was sentenced in April to 10 years in prison for ordering the arrest for deportation of 1,560 Jews during World War II, made his demand on the grounds that he was working for the state when he committed his crimes. Papon will not have to serve his prison sentence until all his appeals are exhausted, a process that could take years.

Missile Talks Held

WASHINGTON — American and Israeli defence and intelligence officials met here last week to assess the threat posed by Iran's missile program. Last month, Iran test-fired a medium-range missile capable of reaching Israel.

Sephardi Festival in Bulgaria

SOFIA — Jews from five countries attended a Sephardi Jewish festival recently held in this Bulgarian capital.

More than 150 participants from Turkey, Bulgaria, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Yugoslavia attended Esperansa '98 was a four-day affair that featured lectures, workshops, concerts, exhibitions and food tasting.

"Long into the night, songs and dances filled the terrace," said one participant. "At one point, a drummer from Turkey, an accordionist from Bosnia-Herzegovina and a guitar player from Croatia played Hava Nagila, while a woman from Bulgaria led a group of dancers."

The festival was organized by several Jewish groups in collaboration with Shalom, the organization of Bulgarian Jews.

Among the events was the presentation of newly published Sephardi cookbooks, which include recipes from Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Turkey.

"Through these recipes one can trace the rise and fall of empires, the ebb and flow of competing ideologies and the fortunes and misfortunes of war," states the preface to one of them.

Israel expecting tourist influx in year 2000

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's minister of tourism expects an unprecedented number of visitors in 2000.

Moshe Katsav said he believes that about 4.5 million tourists will visit Israel in the first year of the new millennium.

In 1995, a record-breaking 2.5 million visitors arrived in Israel. The figure last year was 2.2 million, a reflection of the toll terrorism has exacted on Israel's tourist industry.

Katsav, here to inaugurate the Israel at Fifty pavilion at the Canadian National Exhibition, said in an interview that the government has invested about $300 million (US) to prepare the country for the anticipated influx.

A further $200 million will be spent in the next two years to improve infrastructure and to launch marketing campaigns, he added.

Of the 4.5 million tourists expected in 2000, when Christianity marks its Great Jubilee, about 1.5 million will be non-Jews, Katsav said.

In a bid to encourage Christian tourism from Canada, Katsav met with Cardinal Aloysius Ambrozic in Toronto and Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte in Montreal.

Katsav said the two cardinals expressed a desire to visit Israel. Ambrosic, he quipped, looks forward "to taking a dip in the Dead Sea."

Katsav disclosed that his ministry intends to kick off a massive drive to double the number of Canadian tourists from 46,000 to 100,000, annually.

The campaign, which will focus on the media, will be conducted in cooperation with Air Canada, El Al and a host of tour operators.

Katsav said that he supports Air Canada's quest to increase flights to Israel. During his visit, Katsav conferred with federal Transport Minister David Collenette.

However, he pointed out, he has yet to decide whether Israel-bound Air Canada planes have a right to pick up passengers in the United States.

Seeking inspiration

Last week two of my children and I saw the play, Man of La Mancha, at Stratford

In addition to the significant, special pleasure of being with the girls in the gentle calm of a blue-sky day, I found the production itself an emotional and sensory treat.

It was the second time I had seen the play. The first time was more than 20 years ago. On both occasions, I was profoundly moved.

At various moments during the drama, I felt goose bumps.

The Don Quixote story adapted from Cervantes, combined with the music, the poetry and the acting, were inspiring. And the physical, intellectual, psychological and emotional response to that feeling of being inspired was so very sweet.

How rare it is these days that we feel such inspiration. And what a terrible, regrettable shame that is.

Our children are growing up in a world that demands, from their earliest days in pre-kindergarten, that they be adept at competing and at handling pressure.

The competition and the pressure only increase as they ascend upward along the ladder of formal education, preparing them for the treadmill races and routines of "real-world" post-school, working life. They are forced to learn practical solutions, as only these are the guarantors of advancement and of success.

But what of idealism? What room is left in the character that school and life require of our children, for the development of the values, hopes, aspirations and ideals that formed the main message in Man of La Mancha? And yet what sort of character can we expect to find in our children without those values, hopes, aspirations and ideals?

By its nature, and by the nature of its reporting, the news of the world tends to deflect our children away from the beliefs that animated us in our youth, namely, that we were all special, that we all had unique destinies to fulfil, that our lives carried purpose and meaning, that nothing was beyond our ability, that we could always carry the day.

It seemed to me, as I sat in the theatre, absorbed in exciting play-inspired emotions of idealism, that inspiration was a rarer experience today than "in our time."

Where can we reach to find those fleeting flashes of inspiration capable of kindling sparks inside the souls of people, especially our young people?

As we approach Rosh Hashanah, it is an important subject to explore. I will return to it next week.

The following poem, Remember When the Music, by Harry Chapin, is a bridge to next week's column. It reflects on the same question. Chapin was a quixotic figure himself. He died at the age of 38 in a fiery car crash while on his way home, exhausted, late at night from a benefit concert. He was a balladeer, a story teller, who, above all else, believed in the uniqueness and the importance of all individuals.

This poem is typical Chapin inspiration.

Remember when the music
Came from wooden boxes
Strung with silver wire.
As we sang, the words
Would set our minds on fire
We believed in things.
And so we'd sing…

Remember when the music
Brought us all together
To stand inside the rain.
As we joined our hands
We'd meet in the refrain
We had dreams to live
We had hopes to give.

Remember when the music
Was the best of what we dreamed of
For our childrens' time.
As we sang we worked
For time was just a line
A gift we saved
A gift the future gave.

Don't you remember when the music
Was a rock that we could cling to
So we'd not despair.
And as we sang, we knew
We'd hear an echo fill the air
With his smile and then,
We would smile again.

Oh all the times I listened
And all the times I heard
All the melodies I'm missing
And all the magic words

And all the folks and voices
And the choices we had then
How I'd love to find
We had that kind of choice again.

Remember when the music
Was a glow off the horizon
Of every newborn day
And as we sang, the sun came up
To chase the dark away
And life was good
For we knew we could

Remember when the music
Brought the night across the valley
As the day went down
As we hummed the melody
We'd be safe inside the sound
And so we'd sleep,
We had dreams to keep

Remember when the music
Came from wooden boxes
Strung with silver wire
As we sang, the words
Would set our minds on fire
We believed in things
And so we'd sing
And so we'd sing…

CJC, education minister discuss school funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is returning to the political arena in its bid to secure public funding for Jewish day schools.

Last week, a delegation of Congress officials met with Ontario Education Minister Dave Johnson to suggest he consider including Jewish schools in any future provincial school funding formula.

The current Conservative government is open to new approaches to school funding, and it has made equal funding of children attending public and Roman Catholic schools part of its approach, said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

Although that doesn't include independent schools, Congress suggested to the minister that before the government implements any new funding schemes, it "take a look at our school system as a pilot project to determine if it will fund other independent schools," Landy said.

Any such funding would be limited strictly to the secular portion of the school day, he added.

Congress' meeting with Johnson came more than a year after the Supreme Court of Canada rejected a legal challenge to the current funding practice in which public and Catholic schools are supported by tax revenues while Jewish and other independent schools are supported privately.

Five Jewish parents, supported by Congress, along with parents in Christian schools, challenged that practice. They argued it violated Charter guarantees to freedom of religion and equality. However, the High Court ruled that the unequal treatment was justifiable as part of the constitutional bargain entered at Confederation.

Financial support for Jewish day schools is one of the Jewish community's greatest expenditures. There are between 12,000 and 13,000 students attending Jewish day schools. Annual tuition at Associated Hebrew Schools, for example, an elementary school, is $8,700 per student, while fees at CHAT, a high school, run as high as $10,700 per pupil. The UJA-Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto subsidizes parents who cannot afford the full fees.

Landy said the meeting with Johnson left him "cautiously optimistic...We had a sympathetic hearing from the minister, who appeared to be well briefed about our concerns.

"I expressed to him the level of frustration in our community. It has been the number one issue for Jewish parents for 20 years."

Rob Savage, Johnson's press spokesman, said "the minister listened but there are no immediate plans coming out of it. He said he always keeps his options open, so he'll look into the ideas they proposed."

Congress also expressed its concerns about children in Jewish day schools who have learning, emotional and physical disabilities. These students are unable to access some of the public special education services for children with disabilities, Landy said.

"We explained that the ability to be able to access government services as public schools can, would lessen the already tremendous burdens faced by their parents," said Shirley Worth, chair of the Board of Jewish Education, who also attended the meeting.

The minister was invited to visit a Toronto Jewish day school to see for himself how it operates, and to get a better feel for the issues Jewish parents are struggling with. No date for a visit has yet been set.

Hockey great denies report he praised Hitler

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hockey legend Bobby Hull, known for his swift skating and powerful slapshot, last week showed he could stickhandle as well when he denied a report in an English-language Russian newspaper in which he allegedly praised Adolf Hitler and made other racist comments.

In a news conference held in Sudbury, Hull denied the statements attributed to him by the Moscow Times, calling them "outrageous lies and distortions of the truth."

"I am deeply offended by the false statement s attributed to me with respect to Adolf Hitler and the black community in the United States. To my mind, Hitler was the most evil and despicable person who ever lived and there is nothing good or positive that can ever be said about such an evil man."

In a interview carried in the Moscow Times last week, Hull, who was in Russia to promote a hockey tournament, is quoted as saying "Hitler, for example had some good ideas. He just went a little bit too far." The former Chicago Blackhawk and Winnipeg Jet superstar also reportedly said the black population of the United States was growing too quickly, that the Canadian government was too left wing and that genetic breeding was a good idea.

The newspaper's managing editor, Matt Bivens, stood by the story, saying the reporter, Gennady Fyodorov is fluent in English and didn't misunderstand Hull's comments. However, Hull's version of events was supported by interpreter Svetlana Murashkina, who was present during the interview. She told Canadian Press that Hull was asked about Hitler and other world leaders as part of a feature story on the 21st century.

"As far as I remember, the question was: 'What do you think, is it possible that in the next century there will appear some rebel like Hitler and Stalin?' something like this. In fact, Hull answered not directly.

"He made some speculations...He said for example: 'I raise cattle. I know something about genetics,'" Murashkina said.

Hull, 59, is a member of the Hockey Hall of Fame and a recipient of the Order of Canada. During a glorious NHL career, he scored 610 goals and twice won the Hart Trophy as the league's most valuable player. He jumped to the WHA's Jets in 1972 when offered a million-dollar contract by the teams' Jewish owner, Ben Hatskin.

Mark Weintraub, national chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the Moscow Times report warranted an investigation to determine just what Hull said. Because of the disparity in the version of events, "someone here is not telling the truth," he suggested.

"If it isn't true, it's a scurrilous attribution," Weintraub said. If the newspaper's version holds up, Congress would call on other members of the Order of Canada "to question whether they want to be in the same club with someone who espouses those kinds of views." He said Congress would also call on the Hockey Hall of Fame to review Hull's inclusion.

In a news release titled What did Bobby Hull say?, B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights pointed out that "Hull is a role model for impressionable young minds... If Hull has made these statements, the League is calling on the NHL, the Hockey Hall of Fame and the players' associations to severely censure Hull and distance themselves from these sorts of racist and anti-Semitic comments."

Late last week, Hull's lawyer Timothy Danson announced his client would meet with Congress representatives to give his version of the comments attributed to him.

Gambling survey planned

TORONTO — Jews are being sought for a survey on gambling.

The survey, conducted by the Problem Gambling Service, Donwood Division, of the Centre for Addictions and Mental Health, will establish findings on cultural perceptions on gambling.

Initially, three cultures are being considered: Italian, East Indian and Jewish.

The results will be used primarily to increase understanding of these cultures, and to assist the centre in offering more effective services.

The findings will also be presented at a conference on problem gambling in Edmonton. They will appear in a paper which will try to raise awareness of the need for cultural sensitivity in social services.

Participants are asked to complete an anonymous questionnaire which usually takes between 10 and 20 minutes. It can be done over the phone or in person.

Anyone interested in taking part can contact Vincent Gannam at 599-1322, ext. 217 or toll-free in Ontario at 1-800-647-4414.

Rabbi Sapirman finds spiritual home at Beth Torah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He's travelled a circuitous path from his ultra-Orthodox childhood, but Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, who recently became rabbi of Beth Torah Congregation, feels he has found his spiritual home.

"I'm a modern Orthodox rabbi in a traditional Conservative shul, and I don't think I could feel much closer to the truth," said Rabbi Sapirman in a recent interview. (Technically, Beth Torah is unaffiliated; in practice, it is traditional Conservative.)

Now 30 years old, the Toronto rabbi began his religious quest as a teenager. Although he received smicha from a rabbi in Israel at the age of 18, he felt unfulfilled by the ultra-Orthodox lifestyle in which he'd been raised.

He knew of no resources for someone with his background who wanted to explore modern Orthodoxy. "Emotionally and religiously, I was in turmoil. I started studying on my own, trying to figure out whether I could make the Yiddishkeit that my parents had given me, work for me."

As a young man trying to find himself, he worked a variety of jobs, including construction. A high school dropout at age 15, he entered the University of Toronto as a mature student and studied Political Science for two years.

A few years ago he resumed rabbinical studies in Toronto to qualify for a "Yadin Yadin" smicha, entitling him to serve as leader of a community.

Along the way he met Simcha Jacobovici at a Shabbat meal. The Orthodox filmmaker, who had started a congregation in Riverdale, offered Rabbi Sapirman a job leading High Holiday services. For the young rabbi, Jacobovici and the Danforth represented the melding of the Orthodox and the worldly for which he'd been searching.

From 1994 to 1996 Rabbi Sapirman was the spiritual leader of the Riverdale Jewish Community, serving also as chazzan, baal koreh and adult educator. For the past two years he taught a weekly Torah class at the Beach Hebrew Institute and was also involved in the Danforth Jewish Circle.

Most recently, he spent a year as rabbi of Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, commuting at least once a month to conduct services, run children's programs and teach adults.

But his claim to fame was probably his bicycle repair business, which he ran from 1992 to 1997, and which led to write-ups in the Toronto Star and The CJN.

He decided, however, that he was more suited to the rabbinate than the business world. Being a rabbi allows him a more consistent outlet for his sense of integrity and caring for other people, he explained.

He especially liked serving as rabbi in Peterborough, where he and his wife Gabrielle Pollard enjoyed getting to know people in the congregation. "I loved it. It was a really nice community but extraordinarily diverse. It taught me a lot about diplomacy and listening to both sides of a conversation. It taught me there is no single solution."

Bicycle repairs

He decided, however, that he wanted to be somewhere less diverse that conformed more to his personal philosophy, freeing him to "focus [his] energies on taking a place forward."

Beth Torah, where he succeeds Rabbi Charles Freundlich, is such a place, he believes. The congregation, as Rabbi Sapirman sees it, has "a fundamental respect for Halachah, although it's not necessarily observed by all the members, all of the time."

The Glenbrook Avenue shul, located a few blocks southeast of Lawrence Avenue and Dufferin Street, has about 300 member families. The congregation was established in 1961 by a small group of families; the synagogue was built four years later.

Rabbi Sapirman hopes to bring in more younger people and plans on introducing some innovations in educational programming, among other areas.

Because of his background, he feels he has a unique role to play in building bridges between Jews. "You don't have to agree with me, but you have to respect what I say," he believes. "We're not fighting to abandon the Torah, but to assign Torah values to our daily life."

Rabbi serving at Toronto churches

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A rabbi with a controversial past is serving as a "rabbi-in-residence" at several Toronto churches.

Rabbi Perry Cohen, 60, holds Bible study classes, psalm readings and weekend retreats, and "brings a Judaic perspective" to church life, says United Church spokesman Peter Wyatt.

The rabbi has served as "rabbi-in-residence" at several local United Church congregations, including Lawrence Park, Parkwoods United and the former St. George's and Eglinton United congregations.

Rabbi Cohen says he's also been involved with Anglican and Catholic congregations.

Rabbi Cohen was spiritual leader of Congregation Shaar Shalom in Chomedey, a suburb of Montreal, for five months in 1979, but was fired for sexual impropriety.

He subsequently admitted to having had an affair with the sister of a congregant.

His principal interest is in "sharing the Bible to further a greater understanding of Judaism and [of] the Jewish roots of Christianity," Rabbi Cohen told The CJN.

He also explains Jewish holidays and Hebrew prayers, and "spends a lot of time on [the meaning of] Shabbat."

Reaction to his activities has been "very positive," he said.

"But I don't feel as though I'm doing anything new. This is not out of the ordinary. I'm just sharing the Bible."

Wyatt said Rabbi Cohen's presence resulted in increased interest and a boost in attendance at weekly Bible classes.

The rabbi receives an honorarium, not a salary for his efforts, Wyatt added.

UJA FEDERATION HAS AN INTERNET DREAM
WE NEED SOMEONE TO HELP MAKE IT COME TRUE

Our dream isn't just a Web site, which we already have (www.feduja.org), but a cyber-forum for community organizations (large or small), with our help, to create and maintain their own web pages. We want every member of our Jewish community to interact with each other. And we're well on our way.

Now UJA Federation needs a special person to create and update Internet content; mobilize and coordinate our many dedicated volunteers; communicate with our agencies and other community organizations and help develop policy for our Jewish Toronto Web site.

We are not looking for a technocrat. We are seeking someone with strong creative, communications, organization and outreach skills, accompanied by an understanding of the Jewish community and the significance of the Internet.

If you believe that you're right for this job, please send your resume to Howard English at henglish@ujafed.org (no phone calls, please) as soon as possible. Let us know whether you prefer full or part-time (minimum half-time) work.

Inconsistent too

Two weeks after the Supreme Court's Referendum Reference, Premier Lucien Bouchard continues to interpret the decision with virtuoso sleight of hand. In true trickster's fashion, he spin's the nine judges' opinion away from the centre stage of its actual wording into rhetorical trapdoors and demagogic false closets.

Last week, for example, he ordained that the federal government would be "obliged" to negotiate linguistic and cultural guarantees for francophone minorities in the other provinces. "We ourselves will see to it at the bargaining table," he ostentatiously thumped.

But Bouchard has neither the right nor the authority to negotiate anything for francophone Canadians outside Quebec.

In the first place, the court's decision speaks not one word about, nor does it contemplate, endangered minority francophone rights outside Quebec.

In the second place, he has no legal standing, no moral entitlement, not even the barest tangential legitimacy to speak on behalf of the francophone minority throughout the rest of Canada. They are residents of other provinces. And thus, their respective provincial governments have first-line responsibility to protect their human rights. If local governments fail to do so, the federal government and the courts of the land will intervene, as they have in the past.

Any linguistic, cultural links that the francophone minority outside Quebec shares with the majority inside Quebec confer no special representative legal status upon the premier of Quebec. Indeed, successive governments of Quebec, for their own expedient reasons, have pointedly refused to defend the rights of francophone minorities outside Quebec.

But Bouchard ignores the most compelling reason, namely, that those minorities have not asked him to speak on their behalf. Not one francophone association outside Quebec has petitioned Bouchard to represent them.

Moreover, and most poignantly, by choosing to make their homes, raise their families and pursue a francophone way of life in Manitoba, for example, or in Ontario, or in New Brunswick, or for that matter wherever they live outside Quebec, they have explicitly chosen to live inside Canada. They are effectively saying they will look elsewhere, other than to the government of Quebec, to protect their minority rights.

Bouchard's publicly expressed concern on behalf of minority rights seems contrived and mildly expedient in light of his other pronouncement last week that a simple majority of 50 percent-plus-one vote, would be sufficient to engage secession gears full throttle.

How can anyone accept as sincere the Premier's concern for minorities outside Quebec when he is prepared to ignore the unchanging, passionate political will of at least half of the people inside Quebec?

The premier's willingness to accept a 50 percent-plus-one vote majority, say, as an illustration, two million-plus-one Quebecers voting in favor of secession with two million opposing it, proves that his conscience would not be troubled to wrest half of all Quebecers away from the country of their first choice, namely a united Canada, even to the point of possibly risking severe strains within the civic and social fabric of Quebec society.

What then, of the minority rights of two million federalist Quebecers?

Would Bouchard reciprocate and allow the federal government to "see to [the protection of the rights of the federalist minority inside Quebec] at the bargaining table?" We doubt it.

By demanding the right to champion francophone minority rights outside Quebec, Premier Bouchard is being expedient, disingenuous and inconsistent too.

Experienced no bias in Canadian navy

I would like to address the perception that there is an anti-Jewish bias in the Canadian Armed Forces. A number of months ago, I read an article in The CJN in which a reserve officer in the Navy claimed that he had been systematically discriminated against due to his religious affiliation.

I have been a member of the naval reserves for eight years. In that time, I have never felt discriminated against based on my religion. Further, I have always felt well within my rights to ask for special considerations so that I might be able to follow the laws of kashrut, in order to be observant of holy days, and to conduct myself as a Jew, and feel that my requests were granted to as great a degree as was possible given the existing circumstance.

One month ago my father passed away. I was on a diving course in Victoria, B.C. (Friday) when I received a phone call informing me of the circumstances and the intention to hold the funeral on Sunday. I explained to my instructors the traditions and customs relative to Jewish burial, and hence the need for me to return to Toronto on the next available flight. The military did not question; they acted. They arranged and paid for my travel on the spot. I received a great deal of support waiting for my flight, as well as after the funeral service.

I believe the members of the Canadian Forces acted towards me with chesed. Based on my experiences, I do not believe that an anti-Jewish bias exists in the Canadian military; nor has it existed in my time of service to date.

As well, the Canadian Forces have implemented a mandatory Sexual Harassment and Racism Policy (SHARP). All members of the forces are required to be fully cognoscente of all facets of this policy. The Department of National Defence supports a zero tolerance policy with respect to harassment of any nature.

Israel omitted from Fugitive Pieces

I agree with much in From the editors desk (CJN, Aug. 13) regarding the literary and historical accomplishments demonstrated in Anne Michael's Fugitive Pieces.

However, I must admit to a nagging flaw that struck me after reading the book a year ago. In this book, Israel is never mentioned. Why? Allow me to elucidate on a number of elements I find troubling. As our young hero is growing up, his Greek mentor makes efforts to imbibe him with his Jewish cultural and historical heritage. However, he does not tell him about the amazing creation of the State of Israel. Similarly, there is no passing reference to 1967.

The young boy is haunted by the suspicion that his sister did not die. Does he ever contact Israeli sources about the possible whereabouts of his beloved sister? Only upon his arrival, as an adult, in Toronto, does he consider the possibility of contacting the Jewish community? In the second section of the book, there is much talk about the fate of survivors, their travails, travels, destination. No Israel. It is as though in Anne Michael's historical consciousness, Israel does not exist.

Differing views of Perspectives article

Re: Recalling Zionism's Sephardi Names, by Sarah Taieb-Carlen (CJN, Aug. 20). I was touched because my grandparents and great-grandparents, with other families, left Marrakesh Morocco, in 1919, for then Palestine, for a pilgrimage to visit the tombs of our forefathers. I wrote an article about their experience and also in my possession is my grandfather's passport and my grandmother's copy of her passport and their young son's (my father) laisser passer. I would love to share their experience and have their passports in the books dealing with the subject.

Ms Taieb-Carlen might be too young to remember (CJN, Aug. 20). At the time of Israel's 50th birthday she recalls Herzl, Nordau, Begin and Jabotinsky. But some of us, not of the Revisionist persuasion, have other recollections. We remember this year the real heroes of the creation of Israel: David Ben-Gurion, Moshe Sharet, Golda Meir, the Palmachniks, the kibbutzniks. Current fashionable history not withstanding, those of us who were there might recall these lesser participants of Zionist history.

That fateful day in September, 1939

I would like to remind readers of Friday, Sept. 1, 1939. At 4:45 in the morning, when the darkness of night still covered the sprawling Warsaw metropolis of 1.5 million inhabitants, a frightened voice came over the air waves from the Central Warsaw Radio Station. It was the voice of the president of the Polish Republic, Prof. Ignace Mashtshitzki, bringing the following message:

"Citizens of the Polish Republic!"

"The eternal enemy, the German crusader, has brutally attacked our Fatherland and is sowing death by a dreadful bombardment of open cities and villages in our country. God and history are our witnesses. Justice is on our side."

Thus began the end of Poland's independence, which had lasted barely two decades, and the end of the thousand-year old Jewish settlement in Poland.

The undiscovered palace of King David

By EILAT MAZAR
WZPS

A careful re-examination of biblical text, combined with the results of modern archeological excavations in Jerusalem, have led me to believe that we are now able to locate the site of King David's palace; a palace that if modelled on Phoenician-style buildings would have resembled a small-scale version of King Solomon's magnificent palace in Jerusalem.

The Canaanite/Jebusite city that King David conquered in about 1000 BCE was a mere nine acres on a ridge south of what today we call the Temple Mount. David renamed the city the City of David and made it his capital. Today this ridge is still called in Hebrew Ir David.

From excavations, topography and the biblical text we know quite a bit about this city, which was chosen because of its proximity to the only perennial supply of water in all Jerusalem – the Gihon Spring, which lies to the east of the ridge near the floor of the Kidron Valley.

The City of David excavations, located slightly south of Mount Moriah – the Temple Mount – near pool of Silwan.

Equally important, this ridge is easily defensible as a result of deep valleys on three sides: the Kidron to the east and the Tyropoeon (or Central) Valley to the west and south.

The ridge rises as it moves northward, first to the Ophel (the area between the City of David and the Temple Mount) and then, still higher, to the Temple Mount. This was the city's weak spot, as with no natural barrier, this strategically significant vulnerable northern boundary called for massive defences.

At the time of David's conquest, Jerusalem was a well-fortified city, with a thick city wall dating back to the 18th century BCE. The exact location of the northern section of this wall is unknown, although it seems likely that in order to facilitate the construction of defences, the city's northern border was fixed at the narrowest point of the ridge.

At some point in the 14th to 13th centuries BCE, the Canaanites/Jebusites built the now-famous Stepped-Stone Structure, which internally consists of a huge fill. The massive fill was constructed at the highest point in the city, which happened to be at its extreme northern end, just inside the city wall. The Stepped-Stone Structure was built up over a steep slope descending to the Kidron Valley. It served as the vast foundation for an impressive artificial platform that added a level area of about 2,000 square feet at the top of the hill. It is probably on this level area that the Canaanite/Jebusite citadel, called the Fortress of Zion (Metsudat Zion; 2 Samuel 5:7,9), was built.

The foundation of the Stepped Stone Structure consisted of a complex system of skeleton walls that once ran along and across the slope, forming "boxes" that were then filled with stones. This created a massive and imposing fill structure. Kathleen Kenyon, the British archeologist who dug in this area of the City of David in the 1960s, suggested that the fill structure should be identified with a millo, a term used in the Bible for a fortification built in Jerusalem in the time of David.

I think Kenyon was probably right. The link between the millo and the fill structure known as the Stepped-Stone Structure is very appealing, not only because of the name "millo" (which literally means "filling"), but also because of the location, which accords well with the Bible's description of the millo's strategic importance to the City of David. Note, for example, how important the millo was to Hezekiah's defence of the city during Sennacherib's siege in the late eighth century BCE (2 Chronicles 32:5). In addition, from the reign of King Solomon on, the kings of Jerusalem had to rebuild and reinforce the millo as a complex architectural unit of prime strategic importance (1 Kings 9:15,24).

With this background, let us see if we can determine where King David's palace might be located.

Unlike his son Solomon, David was not a great builder. He was too taken up with wars and political affairs to concentrate on building projects. Nor did he have the architectural experience for carrying out royal building projects. The only royal building the Bible mentions as having been constructed in Jerusalem during his reign is his palace. But this was built for David by Hiram, King of Tyre (2 Samuel 5:11; 1 Cronicles 14:1). This gesture is widely recognized as a symbol of friendship between the Israelite monarch and his Phoenician counterpart, as well as a recognition of the newly acquired importance of the kingdom of Israel and its new capital in Jerusalem.

But Hiram's gift also reflects David's seeming inability to build a palace himself. Hiram sent not only cedar logs, but also carpenters and stonemasons, doubtless because of their scarcity in the new Israelite capital. David lived in the Fortress of Zion, the old Canaanite/Jebusite citadel, until his palace was built.

After David captured Jerusalem, Israel's perennial enemy, the Philistines, could no longer restrain themselves. At this point, we need to look very carefully at the biblical text: "When the Philistines heard that David had been anointed king over Israel, the Philistines marched up in search of David, but David heard of it and he went down to the citadel. The Philistines came and spread out over the Valley of Rephaim" (2 Samuel 5:17-18).

David ultimately prevailed, but that is not our concern here. That the battle occurred in the Valley of Rephaim near Jerusalem indicates that David was already based in Jerusalem at this time. (During the first seven years of his reign, he ruled from Hebron.) When David heard that the Philistines were coming up to wage war against him, he went down to the citadel, that is, to the building on top of the Stepped-Stone Structure. Based on the topography of the site, it would appear that he heard the news of the Philistine advance from a point higher up than the citadel; thus his palace must have been north of the citadel.

There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the biblical description; the Bible is quite careful in its use of going up and going down.

The obvious implication of this passage is that David was already living in his new palace when news arrived of the Philistines' hostile approach. The palace was probably not fortified strongly enough to withstand a direct attack; so the king preferred to barricade himself inside the citadel until the situation improved.

Since the Canaanite/Jebusite citadel had been deliberately built on the city's northern border, adjacent to the narrowest width of the ridge, David's new palace must have been constructed both to the north of the citadel and outside the city's fortified boundaries.

A sketch by William Simpson of 19th century excavations under the Temple Mount.

At first glance, this may seem illogical. Wouldn't the king's palace be built in the most defensible place within the city walls?

The problem was that the small nine-acre site that was Canaanite/Jebusite Jerusalem, had already been built up; there was no room for him to build a palace inside the walls. When David conquered the city, it had already been inhabited for more than 2,000 years, and it had been surrounded by a city wall for nearly 1,000 years. Moreover, Jebusites continued to live in the city after David's conquest, with overcrowding in the city becoming even worse as hundreds of David's followers settled there.

Kenyon also noted this problem, although she did not locate David's palace to the north of the citadel as seems to be required by the biblical text. Instead, she suggested, his palace must have been very small: "David must have cleared a space within the Jebusite town, but the size of his residence is unlikely to have been great, for anything grandiose would have taken too much space within the restricted area of the Jebusite-Davidic city."

It is much more likely, I believe, that David decided to build his new palace outside the city walls. If so, he would probably have chosen a site adjoining the citadel to the north.

King Solomon, David's successor, built a new acropolis further to the north, on the Temple Mount. During the years following, the acropolis developed and was extended southward to the northern Ophel. The northern acropolis' complex of royal buildings was called the "upper house of the king" (Nehemiah 3:25), implying that there must have been a "lower house of the king," which was probably the old acropolis to the south, in the City of David, which preserved its sacred and royal charter (see 2 Chronicles 8:11).

In 1962, Kenyon excavated immediately north of the Stepped-Stone Structure, at the eastern foot of the area where I have placed David's palace, and concluded that during the period of monarchic Jerusalem, a building of some considerable pretensions stood on top of the scarp. Kenyon also found additional evidence of royal architecture: a casement wall, built, she believed, by King Solomon in order to protect the acropolis. In my opinion, they are actually the remains of small palace rooms that originally enclosed a courtyard. Kenyon believed she had stumbled upon the corner of King David's palace. Unfortunately, our dating techniques are not yet so refined that we can easily distinguish between the Solomonic period and the Davidic period in Jerusalem.

When Kenyon sought to excavate this area in the 1960s, she encountered insurmountable barriers. Much of the area was occupied by orchards and gardens, making excavation very costly. Accordingly, she confined herself to a very narrow trench – only three metres wide and extending across the summit. Today, the land is available for excavation, which is very exciting. Who will heed the call to find King David's palace?

Eilat Mazar recently completed the final report on the Temple Mount excavations conducted by her grandfather, Benjamin Mazar, from 1968 to 1977. She directed the excavations of the Ophel, the area between the City of David and the Temple Mount.

Those who follow their dreams

"Strange things are done 'neath the midnight sun, by the men who moyle for gold," wrote Robert Service, poet of the gold-fields.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It certainly feels strange to be driving to Dawson City via Whitehorse in the Yukon to visit a Jewish cemetery. But here we are, on the road to Whitehorse for a Shabbat stopover before heading to Dawson City, centre of the 1898 gold-rush.

Yukon bills itself as the land of dreams. Once it was the land of golden dreams, seducing thousands from all over the world to climb frozen mountain passes, risk death in the Yukon River, or court mayhem in the gold-rush city of Dawson, all for that dream.

At least eight Jews lie buried in the Jewish cemetery above Dawson City. Lost to their families, in exile from any community, they waited for someone to remember that they lived and died here. It is important, I believe, to record their names:

Solomon Packer (d. 1918); Abraham Alton (d. 1901); Benjamin Zerrif (d. 1902); Isaac Simmons (d. 1902); Jacob Klein (d. 1903); Harry Kaplin (d. 1904); Samuel Ross (d. 1911); Jacob Rosenfeld (d. 1931).

Only Solomon Packer has been reclaimed from exile. His story may serve as paradigm. Born in Odessa, he left Russia, possibly to escape forced army service, persecution and poverty. He followed his immigrant dream to the gold-fields, dying at age 57. Only recently when his story was told, did family in Vancouver realize what had happened to their lost uncle.

Immigration to North America was all about dreams. Grandparents and parents slaved long hours at menial jobs so that their children would have a better life. Now, we are about to find some lost sons.

We arrive in Whitehorse on Friday, just as the group is beginning the Shabbat hymn, Lecha Dodi. The first known services here were held 100 years ago at Rosh Hashanah, on Sept. 18, and this year it begins very close to the same date. We are closing a circle of Jewish time that began a century ago.

Saturday we are led by the newest bar mitzvah, Lars, who just celebrated his simchah in Victoria. The davening is very strong as we celebrate together.

Research has uncovered something about a Jewish family that arrived in Dawson a century ago. Solomon and Rebecca Shudenfrie of Krakow are not buried in the cemetery, but they left their children in New York and trekked west, hoping to strike it rich. Their letters have been carefully preserved by their descendants and give a painful account of life in the Klondike. Finding no gold, they turned to commerce. Defeated by fire and the unforgiving Yukon they returned home.

Mother Rebecca wrote: "We have such treasures at home,who certainly will not love us any less for the want of gold, and who cannot love us any more even if we had all the Klondike"

Back to the present. Early Sunday morning we trek north and west along the Yukon River. In bright sunshine we pass the terrible remains of huge forest fires and arrive in Dawson just in time to climb the hill to the cemetery high above the Yukon River. There it is not only Jews who lie buried. There is a section for Masons and their families, a section for RCMP officers who fell, a section for tiny children. A new fence marks the Jewish section, where Solomon Packer's stone stands.

For many years, Jewish residents and visitors intended to reclaim the cemetery. Yukon centennial plans have made it possible, along with the determination of the Jews of Whitehorse. Now the moment has arrived. Birch and alder rustle, a raven calls out as we recite the kaddish. Jews from all over Canada and Europe unite. The men have come home at last.

Back in Whitehorse, we pass the statue of a miner and his trusty dog: "This statue is dedicated to all those who follow their dreams," it says.

What dreams bring Jews here today? Family, friends, a profession or a business, it seems that all who come have the same story: "I came for a year and stayed a lifetime." Indeed there is something mystical about the country, which holds you and promises to be the land of dreams.

The community of the Yukon can be proud of what it has done, returning lost sons to their place in our memory. We all go home richer for having met such intense people. We will not forget each other, we who met in the land of the midnight sun, just as those will not be forgotten who now lie in Dawson's Bet Chaim – House of Life.

The wheel and the Jews

Summertime is traditionally not only an opportunity to enjoy the outdoors, but it also seems to stimulate the endangered art of reading. I found it encouraging therefore, when I recently learned that Thomas Cahill's book, The Gifts of the Jews, is among the best-sellers. Even though the end of summer now comes into sight, it might be well to revisit at least one idea of Cahill's that describes the first (and in many ways the most important) gift that the Jews have bestowed upon the world.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Cahill argues that ancient civilizations, with all the differences, had a common view in at least one respect: the world could be compared to a wheel. The years went by, the wheel turned, but nothing really changed. It didn't matter what people did, who they were, whether they contributed to society or not, whether they were good, bad or indifferent – nothing changed.

This, argues Cahill, is where the Jews came in. Judaism has taught that what we do matters because God cares, that what we contribute is not forgotten, but embedded in the progress that time can bring. We can advance society or retard it, and each person can make his/her contribution to this process. Says Cahill: The Jews were the first people to expose the wheel idea as a myth.

In order to prove his point he claims that some of the most important words in our language are, in fact, the gift of the Jews, because they show the possibility of breaking out of the circle and advancing into new intellectual, technical and religious territory. The words that Cahill believes can be traced back to Jewish ideas are these: new, adventure, surprise; unique, individual, person, vocation; time, history, future; freedom, progress, spirit; faith, hope, justice. The very perceptions behind these words are what the Jews contributed to the world and thereby changed it.

From all of this, Cahill draws a fascinating conclusion. He argues that amongst the most important sections of the Bible are the very ones that are considered by most readers as inconsequential and even boring. He refers to the so-called "begats," that long catalogue in the Book of Genesis (Chapter 10) which lists name after name, generation after generation of the ancients – culminating in the genealogy of Abraham. Why does Cahill believe these lists are so important? Because, he says, they indicate that their bearers were considered to have been individuals. Their lives mattered and were not swallowed up by the Great Wheel and rendered insignificant. They contributed; they are remembered.

I would add another fact to Cahill's list of Jewish gifts: We were not a people that excluded different, and perhaps, unpopular ideas. Everything is up for debate, and in essence, the Talmud is one vast compendium of discussions and often of widely different ideas. To be open, inquisitive and ever-searching – and thereby breaking the wheel – is indeed an essential gift of our people.

The secession decision: a call to action

It did not surprise me when, at minyan on the morning following the Supreme Court's historic decision in the Quebec Secession Reference, an older gentleman came over to me and asked: "Bruce, this court decision, what does it mean for the Jews?" I told him the court decision could well be an important decision for the Jewish community – and all minorities – inside and outside Quebec.

By Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Just in case you were following the Monica and Bill Saga and missed the court's decision, here are the basics: In response to three questions referred to it by the federal government, the court held that: under the Constitution of Canada, Quebec (or any other province for that matter) could not unilaterally secede from Canada; under international law, Quebec does not enjoy a right to secede unilaterally from Canada; and there was no conflict between domestic and international law on this issue. The answers given by the Supreme Court were largely predictable.

This was not the end of the matter, however. The court identified four underlying or foundational constitutional principles which animate the entire Constitution: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the respect for and protection of minorities. These principles give rise to substantive legal obligations. They have full legal force and constitute substantive limitations on government action. They are not merely descriptive but are invested with powerful normative force. This was pretty strong stuff!

The court went on to say that, although Quebec cannot legally unilaterally secede, it can pursue a secession initiative. A "clear majority" vote on a "clear question" in a referendum would confer democratic legitimacy on a secession initiative. A Yes vote would give rise to a constitutional obligation on the part of the federal government and the other provinces to negotiate the potential secession of Quebec from the federation. Negotiations would be expected to address the interests of Quebec, the federal government, all the other provinces, the rights of all Canadians inside and outside Quebec, and the rights or minorities. Finally, the court said that it is up to the political actors – and not the court – to determine what is a "clear majority on a clear question," and if there were to be a clear majority in favor of secession, to supervise the process and the content of the negotiations.

The court's ruling virtually compels the political actors – at a minimum the leaders of the federal government, Quebec and the other provinces – to engage in negotiation prior to any referendum to determine what is a "clear majority on a clear question," and should there be a vote in favor of secession, to negotiate the specifics of that secession.

The Jewish community of Canada should take this as a call to action! The Jewish community of Canada, both inside and outside Quebec, must begin to organize. We must build bridges to other minority communities whose interests are similar to ours. The court has said that respect for and protection of minorities is one of the fundamental normative principles of the Constitution and should animate any negotiations on secession. We have an obligation to ensure that the political actors remember this principle and adhere to it.

The Canadian Jewish Community, largely through the work of the Canadian Jewish Congress, has a rich history of involvement and advocacy on constitutional issues, particularly the protection of minority rights. At the first Congress Plenary in March 1919, the president, Lyon Cohen, called for the constitutionalization of civil, political and religious rights. In 1950, Monroe Abbey, national vice-president, called for the inclusion of individual rights and fundamental freedoms in the British North America Act and, in 1960, Saul Hayes, executive vice-president argued for the inclusion of a Bill of Rights in the BNA Act.

A select committee of Congress headed by Dean Maxwell Cohen presented important submissions to the Parliamentary committee studying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Congress worked hard during the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accord debates to protect individual rights and multiculturalism. Congress has appeared as intervenor in numerous cases advocating for the protection of minority rights. We have an obligation to continue this legacy of activism in constitutional matters, particularly to ensure the protection of the rights of minorities.

The first question the community must tackle is fundamental: Given that minorities are generally better protected in federal states and given that minorities do not generally fare well during times of political and constitutional upheaval, is there any basis upon which the Jews of Canada can accept the secession of Quebec?

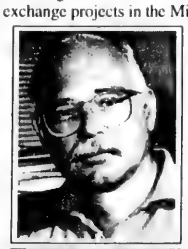
Building bridges in the Middle East



By Sheldon Kirshner

Dr. Arnold Noyek, an ear, nose and throat specialist, is a bridge builder whose medical exchange projects in the Middle East span the chasm of politics.

Noyek, otolaryngologist-in-chief at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and professor of radiology at the University of Toronto, runs the path-breaking Isabel Silverman-Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program, which has a booth at the Israel pavilion at this year's Canadian National Exhibition.

CISEPO, as it is known, is a federally incorporated, charitable, non-governmental organization which provides medical and health services to more than 10 countries and entities, notably Israel, Jordan and the Palestine Authority.

"Disease knows no boundaries," says Dr. Noyek, who's convinced that CISEPO can further the process of normalization between Israel and its Arab neighbors and thus make the Middle East a safer and more secure environment for all nations.

A man whose enthusiasm for his mission is boundless and infectious, he has visited the region several times of late to promote cooperation between Israel and Jordan.

Earlier this year, CISEPO sponsored two conferences on the early detection and management of hearing impairment in infants and children, both of which were attended by Israeli and Jordanian doctors. The first conference was held at the King Hussein Medical Centre in Amman and the second one took place at the Schneider Children's Medical Centre in Petah Tikvah.

Dr. Arnold Noyek

As a result of these meetings, the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss came into being. It is supposedly the first Israeli-Jordanian professional group of its kind since the two countries signed a peace treaty in the autumn of 1994.

Since then, despite a series of crises, Israel and Jordan have forged relatively close relations on the government-to-government level. But professional unions in Jordan, most of whom are controlled by Arab nationalists and Islamic fundamentalists, have resisted the tide of normalization.

Dr. Noyek, therefore, was hardly surprised when the Jordan Medical Association demanded that its members boycott a recent audiology seminar hosted by the Royal Medical Centre in Amman under the auspices of CISEPO.

Facing punative measures, many doctors heeded the warning. But others ignored it, and some of the physicians who boycotted the Amman conference showed up at the symposium in Petah Tikvah.

"Medical exchanges allow us to rise above politics," said Dr. Noyek, who, following Anwar Sadat's historic 1977 visit to Jerusalem, was the University of Alexandria's first Jewish visiting professor.

"But when you're fishing in these waters, you have to be very patient," he cautioned.

Throughout the Middle East, including Israel and Jordan, hearing loss in children is a considerable genetic problem due to intrafamilial marriage. Recognizing this, King Hussein, two and a half years ago, asked CISEPO to get involved in peace building through medicine.

Dr. Noyek, who likens himself to a matchmaker bringing people together, has also taken CISEPO programs to Nablus and Gaza in the Palestinian autonomous areas.

And if his plans pan out, he will add Egypt and Morocco to the list of countries and entities already cooperating with CISEPO. At last count, they were Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, as well as Turkey, Australia, New Zealand, Holland, Norway, Thailand and Brazil.

Based in Mount Sinai Hospital, CISEPO was formed in 1984 as an interactive program involving only Canada and Israel. Back then, Israel was something of a pariah in international medical exchanges, and Dr. Noyek wanted to put an end to this state of affairs.

So what originally began as a bilateral initiative has gradually blossomed into an ambitious multilateral effort supported in Canada by Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, Canada-Israel Committee, Palestine House and the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

"We're mixing medicine and peace," said Dr. Noyek, who has nothing but praise for Arab physicians who "stick out their necks" and participate in collaborative and mutually beneficial programs with Israeli doctors and medical institutions.

Dr. Noyek, who brings an astonishingly positive attitude to his work on behalf of CISEPO, believes that it need not limit itself to hearing impairment problems. "There are possibilities for cooperation in other health fields such as cancer and perinatology," he said, his words resonating with ardor.

One hopes that Dr. Noyek's inspirational message will be heard, loud and clear.

No tears for Czar Nicholas II

I did not shed tears when the remains of Czar Nicholas II and his family were interred with pomp and circumstance in a St. Petersburg cathedral in July.

At the burial ceremony, President Boris Yeltsin declared that "many glorious pages of Russian history were connected with the Romanovs," the dynasty to which Nicholas II belonged.

What he neglected to mention was that Nicholas II, shot by Bolshevik forces in July 1918, was the ethnocentric standard-bearer of a generally reactionary monarchy whose treatment of the Jewish population was invariably abominable.

His namesake, Czar Nicholas I (1825-1855), passed hundreds of anti-Semitic laws and encouraged a system in which "khappers" kidnapped young Jewish men for long periods of military service. Nicholas II's father, Alexander III (1881-1894), tolerated the first organized pogroms, enacted the May Laws (which forbade Jews from owning property outside urban areas), curbed the participation of Jews in local government and imposed a numerus clausus on Jewish university students.

Nicholas II (1894-1917) inherited the anti-Jewish animus of his predecessors. His education was directed by Konstantin Petrovich Pobedonostsev, the jurist whose remark about the fate of the Jews seemed symptomatic of the times: "One-third will die, one-third will leave the country and the last third will be completely assimilated with the Russian people."

Although Nicholas II did not pass new anti-Jewish laws, he resisted advice to dilute or scrap them altogether.

In 1905, Nicholas II extended his patronage to the Union of the Russian People. The Black Hundreds, as this group was known, demanded the imposition of additional anti-Semitic edicts, and played a pivotal role in the infamous 1913 blood libel trial of Menahem Mendel Beilis.

Furthermore, Nicholas II turned a blind eye to pogroms, some of which were organized and perpetrated by the police and the army as part of their campaign against revolutionaries.

The Bolshevik leader who signed the telegram ordering the deaths of Nicholas II and his wife and daughters was Yakov Sverdlov (1885-1919), a Jew. Five years after Sverdlov's death, the name of the city of Yekaterinburg, the scene of Nicholas II's demise, was changed to Sverdlovsk in his honor. With the fall of communism in 1991, the name Yekaterinburg was reinstated.

Empathy and experience

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

When we experience something, we feel a lot more passion for that thing. When we have had an experience with an elderly relative in need of constant nursing care, we become much more compassionate and concerned with the issue of care for seniors. When we have had first- hand experience of substance abuse, we become more attuned and empathetic concerning drug abusers. When we have suffered through bankruptcy, we suddenly become a lot more understanding of the financial pressures of others.

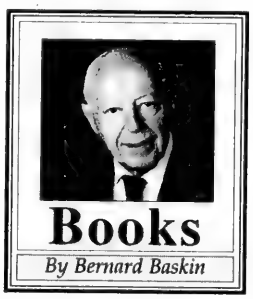
This is good and bad. It is good that we respond to our experiences and grow from them. One could even say that maybe that is what the Almighty is looking for – He wants us to grow from our experiences. When we do get the point, and when we do become more empathetic, that is a good thing.

It is a sad comment as well. The Torah says twice in this week's parshah that we must do a mitzvah because we know what it feels like, because we've been through it. Be careful to stand up for justice for the widow and orphan because you know what it feels like to be on your own in Egypt. Leave some of the crops for the widow and the orphan and remember that you were in Egypt, and experienced this same feeling – that is why I am commanding this to you today. (Deuteronomy, 24:17, 18, 21, 22)

The Torah emphasizes that because we know what it feels like to be on our own we can understand more fully the needs of others who are on their own. That has a sad tinge to it. Shouldn't we be more altruistic, more magnanimous, to be able to empathize with someone even if we have never been through it ourselves? Is our ability to understand the needs of others so weak that we need to experience the pain ourselves before we can really understand it?

The Torah seems to emphasize two points: The first is if you have been through it, if you have been through Egypt and know what it is like to be a slave, then be kinder to slaves. If you have been isolated and lonely, then be kinder to those who are isolated and lonely. If you have had an experience in life that has been difficult and challenging, then use that experience to deepen our empathy and understanding of others.

The second point is to jump the gun, and be kind and empathetic to others in all their different challenges and pains, in order to defuse the need to personally endure that experience in order to understand it. If we already get the point, then maybe we won't need the painful lessons of life.



A complex personality

Helen Keller, A Life*, by Dorothy Herrmann (Random House, $42).

Thirty-one years after her death, Helen Keller is still a household name. Almost everyone knows something about her long and remarkable life. Born a normal child, she was deprived of sight and hearing at 19 months of age, by illness.

When Helen was 7 years old, Anne Sullivan Macy (1866-1936) undertook to educate her through a system of spelling a touch alphabet into her hand. But the basic concept of communication, that of a relationship between words and things, was hard to teach. Understanding of this concept came suddenly. Helen and her teacher were standing by an outdoor pump while someone was pumping water; Miss Sullivan placed the child's hand under the spout while she spelled out the word water in the palm of her other hand. At last, joining the thought of the fresh flowing liquid and the word, Helen stooped down and touched the earth, showing her desire to know its name. By nightfall she had learned 30 words. When she was 10 years old she surprised her teacher by asking to be taught to speak.

Her fame grew with her accomplishment. In 1904 she received a degree from Radcliffe.

Mark Twain, one of her enthusiastic admirers, called her the most marvellous woman since Joan of Arc. "For the rest of his life, he would be one of her greatest champions, defending her against the critics and scoffers. Once, when a mutual friend pointed out her seemingly monotonous life, Twain replied testily, "You're damned wrong there; blindness is an exciting business, I tell you. If you don't believe it, get up some dark night on the wrong side of your bed when the house is on fire, and try to find the door."

By the 1950s, many people around the globe considered Helen an inspiring heroine, a person who overcome grim adversity to become a triumphant symbol of human resilience and courage. In 1964, four years before her death, she was one of 30 Americans on whom President Lyndon Johnson conferred the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian award.

Surprisingly, Helen developed a mystical approach to religion, and for most of her life was a devout Swedenborgian. Also, to the chagrin of family members and high-placed friends, she advocated socialism, and defended the rights of striking workers.

She was violently opposed to the American entry into World War I, not because she was a pacifist, but because she believed the war was largely imperialistic and " a crime against the people," affecting the whole working class, which shed blood, suffered poverty, and got nothing in return.

When Helen fell in love with Peter Fagan, a young and promising journalist, she met fierce resistance from her family. Her mother banished Fagan from the house, and thwarted the elopement plans of the young couple. The affair collapsed ingloriously.

Later, writing about her romance, Helen asserted that "the brief love will remain in my life, a little island of joy surrounded by dark waters. I am glad that I have had the experience of being loved and desired. The fault was not in the loving, but in the circumstances."

Over the years, Helen wrote numerous books, lectured widely and worked tirelessly on behalf of the blind. She deplored the lack of understanding shown to the sightless, and the unwillingness to treat them as mature and able human beings.

She rebuked hearing, sighted people who neglected to observe their surroundings. "Use your eyes as if tomorrow you would be stricken blind. Hear the music of voices, the song of a bird, the mighty strains of an orchestra, as if you would be stricken deaf tomorrow. Touch each object you want to touch as if tomorrow your tactile sense would fail."

This engrossing biography helps the reader to apprehend the elusive personality of a complex, driven, gifted, high-strung, and passionate woman, who, facing a bleak and tragic future, in an act of astonishing transformation, became one of the world's worst admired personalities.

Judaism embodies mysteries, truths

BY RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Elul begins the period of our preparation for the High Holy Days, a time filled with introspection and self-evaluation.

Judaism is a religion that includes a legal structure. Some people feel that Judaism and its legalities embody a cold and restrictive religion.

Our behavior is assessed based on whether we have done a mitzvah or whether we have sinned. Yet where is the spirituality? Can a life governed by laws lead us to the concepts behind the laws? Can prayers that are fixed in their language convey meaningful messages?

According to Jewish law, one may suspend the commandments in order to save a life – all the commandments but three. The sin of murder, the sin of a sexual crime and the sin of idolatry do not supercede the saving of a life. In other words, should someone be threatened with the loss of their own life unless they kill another or rape someone or worship an idol, Judaism would say that their life should be sacrificed. Certain lines are never to be crossed, but one wonders why it is these three that stand alone.

In a religion that values life in the way that Judaism does, one would expect to find no exceptions to ensuring its preservation. Yet these three seem to contradict that premise. However, when one looks closely it becomes clear that it is these three acts that negate the very concepts of life. To murder is to take a life with no justification. To commit a sexual crime is to distort that act through which we create life. To worship idols is to deny the very source of all life. Thus the concept of life is protected through the singling out of these three sins.

Yet what if one has committed one of them? Is there room for repentance and can one be forgiven for so horrible a sin?

Within our history we have examples of these sins and their outcomes. Cain was guilty of needlessly taking a life (Abel's). David was guilty of a sexual crime (adultery). Menasheh was guilty of leading the nation Israel into idolatry during his reign. Interestingly, none of the three men received the punishments they deserved. Although each was punished, he received a lesser punishment, and the Talmud states that this is due to the fact that they truly repented.

Within our prayers, we say to God: "Renew our days as the days of old." The implication is that we long for the days when our relationship with God was more open and direct. However, the word in Hebrew for "days of old" is kedem. "K" represents Cain; "D" represents David and "M" represents Menasheh. Our simple plea is a subtle request of God that our lesser sins be forgiven as their greater sins were forgiven.

Throughout the year we focus on the daily requirements of our religion – the laws and the prayers. During Elul we must force ourselves to expand our views and remember that our seemingly cold and restrictive culture embodies mysteries, subtleties and truths. May we all be inscribed for a healthy and prosperous New Year.

Vizhnitz, Stutchin, Bluzhov, Kotzk, Bobov, Modzitz, Ger, Lubavitch, Klausenburg, Belz, Breslov – even Boston. These are just some of the many towns and cities remembered for their famed chassidic dynasties.

As we approach next week's 300th birthday of the Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, we continue our look at Chassidut on the World Wide Web. This week, some Chassidim that operate their own Web sites.

Not surprisingly, the chassidic group with the largest presence on the Web is Chabad/Lubavitch. Chabad operates many sites in both English and Hebrew. The best place to start is at Chabad of Cyberspace [http://www.chabad.org/] where you can study their beliefs, read their Nine Questions About Moshiach [http://www.chabad.org/9q.htm] or even track down the Chabad emissary in Singapore [http://www.chabad.org/directory.html] – that would be Rabbi Mordechai Abergel. Also check out A Guide to Chabad Literature [http://www.kesser.org/].

The people behind Chabad of Cyberspace were profiled in the book and Web site, 24 Hours in Cyberspace [http://www.cyber24.com/]. In a feature titled Swords into Plowshares: Spreading Judaism at the Speed of Light, [http://www.cyber24.com/htm2/4_45.htm], the site focuses on Rabbi Yosef Kazen, manager of Chabad-Lubavitch in Cyberspace and his Webmaster-son Michael. According to Rabbi Kazen, the Internet is "fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy that swords will be turned into plowshares. The network was created as a Cold War military system; now it's for worldwide education."

Second only to Lubavitch's sites on the Internet are the sites established by Breslov Chassidim [http://www.breslov.org/]. The many sites run by the followers of Rebbe Nachman of Breslov (1772-1810) contain classes, commentary on the weekly Torah portion and inspirational teachings by their beloved Rebbe, such as, "If you believe you can spoil, believe you can fix." I was particularly fascinated by the accounts of the massive annual Rosh Hashanah pilgrimage to Rebbe Nachman's grave in Uman, Ukraine [http://www.breslov.com/]. Discount travel information to Uman is available at the same site.

Although chassidic movements are usually identified with towns in eastern Europe, that is not always the case. The Bostoner Rebbe, Grand Rabbi Levi Yitzchok Horowitz [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0798/bostoner1.html] leads his followers from both Boston and Israel [http://www.ou.org/network/shuls/bostener.html].

One of the most surprising sites I came across is run by Satmar Chassidim [http://www.satmar.com]. These Chassidim are traditionally not nearly as extroverted as Lubavitchers, for example, and usually shun the use of modern technology for outreach. The authors of this Web site stress that their work is unofficial. Much of the site is devoted to news and photographs of the movement's leaders, along with coverage of what it calls "the largest Orthodox Jewish community on earth." In addition, the site contains articles critical of Zionism and the State of Israel.

The Satmar Web site is being rebuilt at the moment after having been unavailable for three months. I'm not sure whether the new site will recreate one of the most interesting home pages I've seen on the Internet. Visitors to the old Satmar Web site were greeted by a warning in Yiddish only that if you could understand the warning, then you shouldn't be spending your time on the Internet.

Despite the criticism, ICC is good for Jewish people

By SIMON ROSENBLUM

Much has been said in our Jewish world about the recent creation of a permanent International Criminal Court (ICC). Most of it has been negative, too negative, as a good deal of the criticism is based on worst-case scenarios and misinformation.

Guest Voices

The court, recently established by the world community at a month-long conference in Rome, will be given – subject to ratification by the governments of at least 60 countries – the "power to exercise its jurisdiction over persons for the most serious crimes of international concern." These crimes include genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and – subject to a precise definition yet to be determined – aggression.

First, it must be asked if such a court is good for the Jews. The answer in principle is an almost unanimous yes. Who is more attentive than we are to the horrors of genocide and the impunity with which the perpetrators of war crimes have acted. The international Jewish community has favored a kind of global Nuremberg for some time.

So why has the establishment of this particular court been viewed by many as a sorry day for Jews? Primarily because the ICC statute is said, due to Arab pressure, to single out Israel and label Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza as a war crime. No matter what one's personal views are regarding these settlements, it would obviously be a severe perversion of justice for an ICC to place these settlements on the same moral plane as, for example, genocide and ethnic cleansing in Rwanda and Bosnia.

But does the ICC as agreed upon in Rome really do this? Article 8 in the war crimes section of its statute clearly identifies "the transfer, directly or indirectly by the occupying power of parts of its civilian population into the territory it occupies" as a war crime. On the face of it, this could apply to the territory Israel acquired in the 1948 war as much as to the post-1967 settlements.

How, you might ask, did the Arabs get away with exerting pressure to insert this clause into the ICC mandate. Basically they didn't. This section, which is intended to deal with the crime of ethnic cleansing along with a great many others that one might question, was simply transferred into the document from the Geneva Convention.

That being said, this – and other sections which were moved over from the Geneva Convention – could indeed be the cause of frivolous claims, unnecessary investigations, and conceivably inappropriate convictions.

As Jews we have a legitimate concern here both as to how it affects Israel and over the credibility and effectiveness of the court itself. Will the court be likely to pursue inappropriate missions, or will it essentially stick to its knitting and strictly focus on the most heinous crimes? In all likelihood, the latter. But one can never discount the possibility of a rogue prosecutor. Obviously we must be on guard for such an eventuality, but at the same time, we must not throw out the baby with the bath water.

It may very well be that the ICC should have given itself a more restricted mandate. I, for one, fear that it may get too involved trying to prosecute wars of aggression, which is a highly subjective area where truth is very much in the eyes of the beholder. But the ICC statute as it stands will be, for better or worse, its governing text and there is no amendment procedure. The ratification process will easily and quickly receive the support of 60 or more nations.

That being understood, it might very well be possible and useful to get governments to append a letter to those ratifications. Such a letter — not an uncommon instrument in international diplomacy — would simply note the country's strong wish that the ICC stick to its essential mandate and only deal with "the most serious crimes of international concern." Such an initiative from "friends of the court" could play a most useful role in steering the court in its formative years.

United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan has called the birth of the ICC a "gift of hope" as "at long last we aim to prove we mean it when we say, never again." In that spirit, let us as Jews celebrate the creation of the court and help ensure that it functions in the manner that it was intended to.

Dear Jewish Community Member:

Today our community is perched on the crest of a new century. We have a lot to be proud of and many more challenges to overcome.

Twenty years ago, about 120,000 Jews lived in Toronto. Now we are a booming community of at least 175,000. At the same time, the number of elderly, poor and vulnerable members of our community has sharply increased. For many of our young people, Jewish identity is in danger and more than one million Jews inside the unstable former Soviet Union are waiting to get out. Yet, over the past 10 years, our community, despite its success, has not kept pace with these challenges.

It's time for a bold, new approach. It's time to take a giant leap forward.

In consultation with our contributors, community leaders, agencies and schools, UJA Federation has launched a dramatic vision. The Campaign for Fifty.

With your help, we intend to raise an unprecedented $50 million annually by 2001. That's $13.5 million more than last year for innovative new projects to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews in danger around the world. Only UJA Federation is capable of undertaking such far-reaching initiatives.

Let's not underestimate ourselves. Decade after decade, as Israel suffered tragedies and celebrated triumphs, our community has overcome seemingly insurmountable challenges. Today, the challenge of meeting the new needs of a new century is of equal magnitude.

The following two pages provide a detailed outline of the Campaign for Fifty, through which our community will be helping those who can't ask for themselves.

Thank you for your commitment to UJA Federation on behalf of thousands in need. Please consider your gift today. Because no one gift changes more lives. And no other cause stands behind them all.

Campaign for Fifty

A bold beginning.

The Campaign for Fifty is an ambitious, bold, new agenda to begin meeting the needs of a new century. To help the poor, frail, isolated and abused. To bring thousands of our young people back to Jewish life. To ensure a safe haven in Israel for Jews requiring rescue around the world.

Through the Campaign for Fifty, we intend to raise $50 million annually by 2001. That's $13.5 million more than we raised last year for innovative projects to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and rescue Jews in danger around the world.

Strengthening Identity

Too many members of our community have lost their attachment to Jewish life. To fortify their ties, UJA Federation will allocate $6.5 million in additional funds for programs such as:

- Enhanced Jewish supplementary school curriculum development and teacher training.
- Day school subsidies for more families in need.
- Opportunities for families to experience the beauty of Jewish life together.
- The Gift of Israel – a plan for families, enabling thousands of teens to personally experience Israel.
- Expansion of Toronto's outstanding participation in the March of the Living.

Assisting the vulnerable

Many in our extended family are suffering. Now, it's time to do more!

To help the vulnerable, UJA Federation will spend $4.3 million in additional funds on:

- Increased financial assistance for food, housing, child care, camp subsidies and cutting edge employment programs on behalf of Toronto's 21,000 Jewish poor.
- Access to special, day school education for severely challenged Jewish children.
- Greater access to counseling and crisis intervention for the growing number of women suffering family violence.
- Additional day care and home care programs for a larger population of frail, isolated elderly.
- Food baskets to nourish over 200,000 desperately poor seniors in the former Soviet Union.
- An enhanced hospice program for the terminally ill to live out their remaining days in peace and dignity.

Rescue

A Jew in danger is a Jew who must be rescued.

The Campaign for Fifty will allocate $1.5 million in new funds to further rescue efforts in the FSU by:

- Ensuring that every single Jew who wants to leave the former Soviet Union gets out.
- Helping the Jewish Agency set aside resources to swiftly free Jews from life threatening situations, anywhere in the world.
- Expanding support for the increasing number of FSU teenagers who are making aliyah without their parents.
- Providing funds to maintain 270 Hebrew language courses in the FSU and dozens of Jewish Agency camps, where 20,000 youngsters are celebrating their first taste of Judaism.

No one gift changes more lives

The Campaign for Fifty is an unprecedented initiative which extends the vision of our predecessors, who built this remarkable community.

Make your gift for the future today. Because no one gift changes more lives. And no other cause stands behind them all.

Israel expecting record tourist influx for year 2000

Katsav dismissed as inaccurate a recent report by the Israel Hotel Association that the deadlocked Oslo peace process has led to a 20 percent drop in tourism during the past three years.

"The peace process has had no negative impact," declared Katsav, 53, who immigrated to Israel from Iran at the age of five with his family.

"Israel, for tourists, is a very attractive country. They love to come to Israel."

Katsav acknowledged that while terrorism has had an impact on tourism, the effect has not been "dramatic."

In the wake of a series of suicide bombings in Israel in February and March 1996, there was a falloff of 300,000 visitors.

He noted that tourism dropped by several percentage points as a result of last winter's standoff between the United States and Iraq over weapons' inspections.

Claiming that Israel is a safe destination, Katsav said that not a single tourist has been injured in a terrorist incident in recent years.

He said that terrorism was a more serious problem in Israel's first three decades of existence than today.

Katsav, who is also the deputy prime minister, said that Israel is determined to carry on with the stalled peace process.

"We have every intention to fulfil it. The problem is that (Yasser) Arafat doesn't respect the Oslo accord."

Listing what he called a major Palestinian infraction, Katsav said the Palestine National Council has yet to abrogate clauses in the PLO's charter calling for Israel's destruction.

Furthermore, he noted, the Palestinian police force in the autonomous areas exceeds its required size, and the Palestine Authority refuses to extradite 33 Palestinians who've murdered Jews.

Katsav predicted that Israeli forces would eventually redeploy from the West Bank, but only after the Palestinians honor their commitments. "There are no time lines," he warned, referring to future Israeli withdrawals.

As for the continuing inability of both sides to reach an agreement over a Palestinian airport and a harbor in the Gaza Strip, Katsav said that security problems are blocking implementation.

He claimed that neither the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, nor the expansion of settlements beyond the Green Line, were obstacles in the peace process.

"We aren't taking land from the Palestinians. Ninety-eight percent of the Palestinians live under the jurisdiction of the Palestine Authority. The Palestinians have almost full autonomy."

As for the prospect of a Palestinian state in the territories, Katsav said, "We'll try to prevent it. It would be a big danger for Israel's existence. We are ready to give the Palestinians all possibilities except responsibility for foreign affairs and security."

Asked why Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had decided not to attend an official function in Norway marking the fifth anniversary of the Oslo accords, Katsav replied, "We are not boycotting this ceremony. The prime minister is very busy now.

"We're discussing redeployment. I see no problem that he won't be there. The time of ceremonies will come after we reach a real and permanent peace agreement with the Palestinians."

The Oslo process, he said, remains alive.

Katsav, the minister in charge of Israeli Arab affairs, conceded that Israel is still trying "to close the gap" between Jews and Arabs in terms of budgetary allocations, social services and employment opportunities.

"Due to security considerations and the absorption of Jewish refugees, we had no money to invest in Arab society," he explained. "Now we want to improve the situation."

Katsav said he has increased Arab muncipal budgets by $25 million and intends to create more jobs for Arabs in the civil service. As well, he hopes to improve the level of social services, open new schools, build better roads and develop industry in the Arab sector.

"It is still too early to induct Arabs in the Israel Defence Force," he said, acknowledging that the vast majority of Israeli Arab men are not conscripted. "It could be a conflict for them.

"I prefer national service for Arabs. We're working on it. In fact, I discussed this matter with Arab leaders a few weeks ago, and most support it."

Katsav said that 99 percent of Israeli Arabs are loyal to the state, while one percent "do not respect Israeli law."

Teitelbaum takes over as new AGO director

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Matthew Teitelbaum, the incoming director of the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), has a life-long connection with that museum.

"The AGO was a staple of my childhood," said Teitelbaum, the chief curator, whose new appointment takes effect on Sept. 8.

"It was, in many ways, the institution which helped connect me to the world of art."

Teitelbaum was introduced to the AGO by his father, Mashel, an artist whose paintings are found in galleries across Canada, including the AGO.

(In 1992, five museums in Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor and Kitchener-Waterloo presented a retrospective of his works, and in one acrylic piece, entitled Three Generations, Mashel cradles the infant Matthew on an arm).

"I lived in a household with works of art around me all the time," he recalled in an interview shortly after the announcement that he would succeed Maxwell Anderson as director of the AGO. "The idea of art was as natural to me as breathing."

Teitelbaum, the AGO's first Jewish director, joined the museum in 1993 after having spent four years as the curator of Boston's Institute of Contemporary Arts.

Prior to that, he held similar positions at the Mendel Art Gallery in Saskatoon, the city of his father's birth, and the London Regional Art Gallery in Ontario.

An authority on contemporary art, Teitelbaum, 42, was born and raised in Toronto, one of three children sired by Mashel and Ethel (a former judge on the Immigration Appeal Board).

Mashel, who died in 1985, was the son of Max, a Russian immigrant who lived in Kingston before settling down in Saskatoon as a dry goods merchant. Mashel's mother, Sarah Kilstein, was an American from Toledo, Ohio.

By Teitelbaum's estimate, Mashel, who was strongly influenced by German Expressionism and Abstract Expressionism, enjoyed "moments of commercial success" and the respect of his peers.

But in terms of earning a steady income, he was far from successful. To support his family, he worked as a set designer at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and ran an art school. When he died, he had $21 in his bank account.

Perhaps because of his father's travails, Teitelbaum studied history rather than art at Carleton University.

In 1980, however, he enrolled at the Courtauld Institute of Art in London, England. "I wanted certain mysterious things about the art world explained," he said. "How reputations are formed, how artists create a voice of their own."

Teitelbaum graduated in 1982 with a graduate degree in modern European painting and sculpture. His thesis was on Ivon Hitchens and the British landscape tradition.

In 1981, midway through his course, he landed a summer job as an adult education officer at the AGO. Twelve years would elapse before he returned to the AGO, the eighth largest art museum in North America and the second biggest one in Canada after the National Gallery in Ottawa.

As the AGO's chief curator, a job he loved, Teitelbaum had a lot on his plate. His responsibilities ranged from conceiving and mounting exhibitions to developing annual budgets.

During this period, he tried to build a strong Canadian collection around artists like Betty Goodwin, Paterson Ewen and Greg Curnoe. Teitelbaum was of the opinion that contemporary Canadian art was worthy of study.

And in designing exhibitions,

Matthew Teitelbaum

Teitelbaum did his best to ensure that they were "more pleasurable and intellectually engaging" for the public.

As director, he has several objectives in mind.

"I want the AGO to increase its international profile; to be an increasingly effective advocate of Canadian art, at home and abroad; to ensure that it's a place where people have remarkable experiences with art; to strengthen initiatives to be multi-generational; to be more relevant to teaching communities; to attract viewers of all backgrounds."

Teitelbaum also hopes to aggressively build the collection, which comprises 24,000 works representing 1,000 years of European, Canadian, modern, contemporary and Inuit art.

As well, he has every intention of continuing to mount so-called blockbusters, such as the current Courtauld exhibition of Impressionism.

The schedule for the next few months seems impressive. In early October, there will be an exhibit of 19th century Dutch paintings, and in mid-November, a survey of the works of Betty Goodwin gets under way.

In the spring of 1999, the AGO will present an exhibition on the theme of angels from the Vatican's museums.

Teitelbaum, who's married to educator Susan Cohen, with whom he has two boys (Max, 7, and Elijah, 5), is thrilled by his new appointment.

"It really is an honor to lead the AGO into the next century. It's more meaningful than I could have imagined. The AGO has been part of my life for so long."

HISTORIC CAMPAIGN BEGINS

Laughter, song and a dramatic new approach to fundraising signaled the beginning of UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty earlier this week at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

Over 1,000 community members launched the historic drive to raise $50 million annually by 2001 - $13.5 million more than last year. The additional funds raised will be earmarked for new projects - $6.5 million to help strengthen Jewish identity, $4.3 million to assist the vulnerable, including 4,000 Jewish children living in poverty, and $1.5 million to rescue Jews from unstable regions such as the former Soviet Union.

"This year we will push our campaign to new heights so that we can respond to the new realities of our community and meet the needs that have been set aside for too long," declared Brent Belzberg, who is co-chairing the Campaign for Fifty with Lawrence Tanenbaum.

"Today we have a new challenge - not one based on extreme crisis or perils of war, but rather the challenge facing a mature, caring community which is making choices about what kind of future we will build together," said Tanenbaum.

The audience was thrilled by reports from Tanenbaum and Belzberg that many donors have already committed to significantly increasing their UJA Federation gifts – some by more than 50%. Campaign for Fifty gifts have already increased by $3.5 million for a total of over $14 million to date.

But the Launch was not entirely focused on the business of fundraising. Participants were also treated to performances by the internationally acclaimed Yovel group from Israel and Tuvia Tsafir, popular Israeli comedian/impersonator .

"It was a real celebration of community and our commitment to the State of Israel," noted Barbara Bank who Co-Chaired the event with David Koschitzky. "Now we're ready to get to work."

Working with Campaign for Fifty Co-Chairs Belzberg and Tanenbaum are Vice-Chairs Howard Price, Glennie Lindenberg and Abe Glowinsky and Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel.

CAMPAIGNERS TOLD TO BE BOLD

Last week more than 300 UJA Federation campaigners got a lesson in thinking big as they prepare to raise the level of community giving to new heights through UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty.

"We're talking about a dramatic departure from past campaigns," UJA Federation Vice-President of Fundraising Ted Sokolsky told the crowds at several training sessions held throughout the city. "We've got to think big to reach an annual total of $50 million by 2001."

And thinking big, according to Sokolsky, means asking donors to increase their UJA Federation gifts right off the bat in order to meet the new needs of a new century. The Campaign, which was officially launched on August 31, has already raised $14 million - $3.5 million in increased gifts from leading donors.

Jonathan Miller shows campaigners the box of food rations that UJA Federation funded programs provide every 6 weeks for needy Jews in the FSU. Photos: Stephen Epstein

Despite last year's successful $36.5 million campaign, notes Brent Belzberg, who is co-chairing the Campaign for Fifty with Lawrence Tanenbaum, the community has failed to keep pace with its incredible growth and severe government cutbacks. Extensive consultations held earlier this year with key community leaders determined that an additional $13.5 million new dollars are needed to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews from unstable and dangerous regions all over the world.

UJA Federation campaigners were presented with new fundraising strategies to make the Campaign for Fifty a success.

Jonathan Miller, who is heading UJA Federation's canvasser training says "this is the year people will do what is right. They just need to be given the opportunity."

The first in a series of UJA Federation telethons will begin with Super Sunday, September 13. If you are interested in participating in one of UJA Federation's upcoming Super Sunday and Super Week telethons, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

FUND FOR MARCH OF THE LIVING

More Jewish Toronto high school students will experience a lesson in history few will forget thanks to a new March of the Living Endowment Fund set up by members of UJA Federation's Societies Cabinet.

The special $500,000 fund will be used to create more scholarships for Jewish youth to participate in the UJA Federation funded March which takes students to concentration camp sites in Poland before moving on to Israel. Last year 140 Toronto teens participated in the March.

The unique program is particularly important to Societies Cabinet members, many of whom are Holocaust survivors or escaped from Nazi persecution during World War II.

"We must make sure our children see for themselves what we went through," emphasizes Phil Skovronek, Past President of the Chenstochover Society. "They will continue to tell the world the story and lessons of the Holocaust."

Many Mutual Benefit Societies were established in Toronto following the arrival of thousands of Jews from Europe before and after WWII. Close to 6,000 UJA Federation Societies members raise over $700,000 for the annual campaign.

VISITING KIEV IS CARING IN ACTION

By Howard Lichtman

My connection to the former Soviet Union runs deep. My maternal grandparents were from

Howard Lichtman

Belarus, and when I told my father I was going on a mission to Kiev, he told me that he had been there during the War. In prison. While escaping the Germans in Poland, he crossed over into the Soviet Union and was arrested as a spy. He was jailed for a short while in a small town near Kiev and ultimately sent to Siberia, but that's another story.

Why is all this important? Because under different circumstances, I and many other North American Jews could be in the former Soviet Union today. It could be any one of us living there in need.

Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, is a city of 3 million people with a Jewish population of around 100,000. Ukraine itself has 500,000 Jews. Many people would be surprised to find out that Ukraine is the fifth largest Jewish country in the world after France.

Like Jews in other former Soviet countries, those in Ukraine suffered 70 years of oppression and forced assimilation.

The collapse of the Soviet empire thrust Ukraine into the throes of economic crisis. Jews are leaving today at the rate of 48,000 per year. This is not only because of anti-Semitism but because of their bleak, economic prospects. Unemployment is rampant, government, health and social services are collapsing, and there are thousands of elderly Jews suffering from malnutrition and lack of proper medical care.

Young people throughout the FSU are learning Hebrew at Jewish Agency run Ulpans to prepare them for aliyah.

So what are we, the Jewish people doing? What I saw on my visit to Kiev made me proud to be a member of the Jewish people, and proud to be a volunteer and contributor to UJA Federation. Through the Jewish Agency, we are assisting individuals in making aliyah to Israel. We visited ulpanot, where Jews are learning Hebrew and connecting with their Judaism for the first time. Everyone, from teenagers to people who are over 70 years old was studying Hebrew. They wanted to learn the language so they could speak to their children who had moved to Israel or to ultimately make aliyah themselves.

We also visited a very different type of classroom, where individuals who are making aliyah within the month learn what their experience will be when they land in Israel. We visited groups of parents whose kids have made aliyah without them. Through UJA Federation, family was facilitating their continued connection with their children.

If everyone could witness with their own eyes where our money goes in the former Soviet Union, we would gain a different level of appreciation for both how lucky we are to live as Jews in Canada, and the importance of our contributions to UJA Federation. We say that no one gift changes more lives. To see even one life changed should be enough.

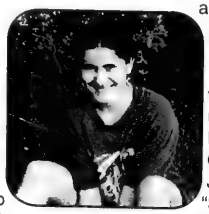
Volunteer Views

Andrea Kormendi likes to finish what she starts. But when it came to volunteering at the Bathurst Jewish Centre's Stroke Recovery Program, a UJA Federation funded initiative, Kormendi passed the finish line and went far beyond.



"I only had to volunteer for 20 hours in order to get my OAC credit," explains the 19-year-old Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate. "But I found the work and the human contact so rewarding that I ended up more than doubling my hours."

Kormendi says she felt very appreciated when she would help stroke victims with everything from rehabilitation exercises to serving coffee and other refreshments twice a week at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The Stroke Recovery Program, relies on volunteers like Kormendi all year round to assist full-time staff.

"Andrea is a very valued volunteer," notes BJC Director of Group Services Janice Roth. "She stayed on after she had completed her requirements to help fill in while many of our regular volunteers were on winter vacation."

If you would like to become a volunteer with the BJC Stroke Recovery Program call (416) 636-1880 ext. 229. For information about other volunteer opportunities in the community call Shelly Rotman at UJA Federation (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

CNE Pavilion Houses The Best of Israel

There are only a few days left to discover some of Israel's most unique treasures - all under one roof – at the Israel at Fifty Pavilion at the CNE.

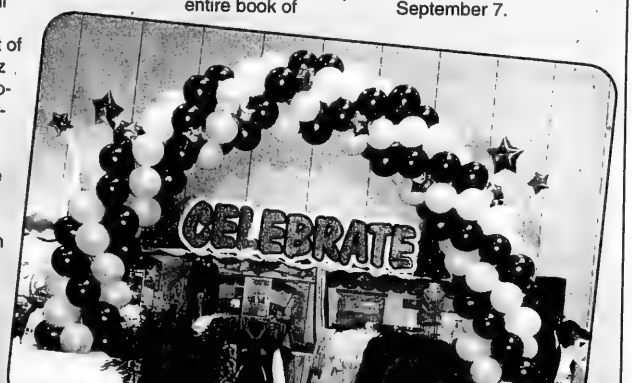
The Israel at Fifty marketplace features more than 60 vendors selling everything from one-of-a-kind crafts to the latest designs in Israeli footwear.

"It's the best of Israel," says Roz Witkin, who is co-chairing the marketplace with Francie Storm.

"Many of the items on display cannot be found anywhere else in Canada," adds Witkin. These include hand-made silver jewelry, tablecloths, hand-painted glassware and a wide selection of popular Israeli Dead Sea cosmetic products.

Leon Azoulay has been drawing large crowds with his rare microcaligraphic art. It can take up to a year for the artist, whose pieces have received world-wide acclaim, to complete his works using tiny Hebrew letters to illustrate designs. Azoulay even fits the entire book of Genesis on one 50cm x 70cm canvass.

The marketplace and other Pavilion attractions, including a 5th Century mosaic synagogue floor, a Negev Desert landscape and the Children's Discovery Museum, will be open at the National Trade Centre, Exhibit Hall B until September 7.



Shoppers can browse through a wide array of Israeli products and art at the Israel at Fifty Pavilion.

Oberlander case switches venue to Kitchener

TORONTO — Canadian immigration policy in force at the time alleged war criminal Helmut Oberlander entered the country did not make simple membership in the Nazi SS a ground for exclusion, according to arguments advanced in Federal Court by defence lawyer Eric Hafemann.

Only "major offenders," "offenders" or "security risks" are mentioned in documents describing excluded individuals, Hafemann suggested during cross examination of William Kelly, who served as the RCMP officer in charge of European visa control from 1951-54.

A May 30, 1952 memo from Deputy Minister of Immigration Laval Fortier states that members of the SS, SD (the security arm of the SS), Abwehr (German intelligence) and Gestapo should be refused entry if they were "classified as a 'major offender or offender' under what was called an Allied Control Council Directive, adopted in 1946," the Kitchener-Waterloo Record reported.

Hafemann later told the newspaper that definition would not include Oberlander, who came to Canada in 1954.

The federal Justice and Immigration Departments are attempting to strip Oberlander, 74, of his Canadian citizenship as a prelude to deportation.

Government documents allege Oberlander, a resident of Kitchener, lied to immigration officials about his wartime activities. They claim he was a member of the Einsatzgruppen, Nazi SS killing units that murdered tens of thousands of Jews, Gypsies, communists and others designated enemies of Germany.

They also allege Oberlander, an ethnic German living in Ukraine, joined Einsatzkommando 10A as a 17-year-old interpreter. Justice department lawyer Peter Vita told Federal Court that Oberlander wore an SS uniform, carried a pistol and was involved in the interrogation of prisoners. Oberlander denies questioning prisoners for the Einsatzgruppen and claims he was "forced" to work as an interpreter for the German Security Service, a component of the SS.

Hafemann told the court that Oberlander and his wife Margaret will testify during the hearing.

The case switched venues to Kitchener earlier this week.

Apology for cemetery desecration

TORONTO — A 20-year-old with links to neo-Nazi organizations apologized here last week for toppling headstones in a Jewish cemetery in St. Catharines in April.

Warren Michael Soles stood in the prisoner's box and asked for forgiveness for desecrating the B'nai Israel cemetery April 25.

"I hope you find it in your hearts to forgive me and accept my apologies," he said.

But Sam Walters, president of B'nai Israel Congregation, said Soles should have expressed remorse the day after the attack.

Soles was to have been sentenced last week, but the judge postponed sentencing to Sept. 16.

Soles pleaded guilty in July to one charge of concealing a weapon, one charge of mischief causing damage over $5,000, and 43 counts of damaging gravestones – one for every tombstone knocked over in the attack.

Damage in the attack was estimated at between $5,000 and $8,000.

Police say Soles is affiliated with several neo-Nazi groups, and that he sports Nazi-style tattoos.

New Jewish group launched for young adults in Victoria

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

VICTORIA, B.C. — A new group for young Jewish adults is getting off the ground in Victoria.

Jean Dragushan said she didn't think twice when asked earlier this year to co-chair the new youth leadership outreach committee for the Victoria and Vancouver Island Jewish Federation.

The mother of two children in their early 20s, Dragushan is working with co-chair Rowena Peters, who also has two university-age children, and a committee of half a dozen people.

Graduate student Joel Freedman, 27, who was recently hired as adviser/coordinator for the group, is excited by the commitment the community is showing to its young people.

"I think it's a really important step the community has taken in making a formal link with university-age people in the community," he said in a phone interview from Victoria.

A native of Vancouver who has lived in Victoria on and off since 1992, Freedman was active in a now-defunct student group called Or Lapidim.

Although Or Lapidim enjoyed "some successful years," according to Dragushan, speaking by phone from her home in Victoria, "the lack of a paid person to act as a coordinator was a significant problem, because the student population is transient and people are involved with their studies."

The local federation was not yet established when Or Lapidim was formed. The Victoria and Vancouver Island Jewish Federation was organized about five years ago as an unofficial federation. It is not a member of UIA Federations Canada.

The new group will serve Jewish students at the University of Victoria, Camosun College and Royal Roads University, as well as their peers who are working or "in transition."

In a small community like Victoria, young people are seen as a particularly important resource, said Dragushan. She figures there are several thousand Jews in Victoria, although many do not affiliate with the Jewish community.

Freedman estimates there are up to 500 Jewish post-secondary students in Victoria. When Or Lapidim was last active, there were about 110 members. Over the past ten years the University of Victoria has nearly doubled its enrolment, and Freedman suspects there is a concomitant increase in the Jewish student population.

Dragushan hopes participants in the new group will continue to develop their Jewish identity. Maintaining a Jewish identity is harder in a small community, she noted, because there are fewer outlets – like a Jewish community centre, for example – where people can "give voice to" their Jewish identity.

"We have a wider goal," she added, "which is to help [young people] prepare to assume a role in the Jewish community at large, whether in Victoria or another community."

Victoria Jews can feel isolated from the rest of the Canadian Jewish community, noted Freedman. The flip side, he added, is that the community, being small, is "very tightly-knit and supportive."

"Our intention," said Freedman, "is that the group will offer a range of cultural, religious and educational activities. Incoming members will...direct it for themselves, with facilitation that I and others in the community can offer."

One upcoming program is a "Jewish orientation to Victoria," to take place the Sunday before Rosh Hashanah.

Anyone wishing further information can contact Freedman by e-mail at [freedman@uvic.ca] or contact the group by phone at 250-370-9488.

Endowment fund launched

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A celebration by friends, relatives and former classmates, in honor of Nobel Laureate Myron Scholes, will officially launch the Hamilton Legacy Endowment Fund.

"The committee felt it would be great to officially launch the fund at an event where we have something wonderful to celebrate. We are so proud of Myron,whom we consider one of our own, and who has had such a profound impact on the world of finance.

"We hope the Legacy Endowment Fund will likewise have a profound positive impact on our community for many years to come," said Stanley Tick, legacy endowment fund chair.

Chair of the organizing committee is Molly Ann Schwarcz.

Scholes, who shared the 1997 Nobel Prize for economics with Robert Merton of Harvard University, was born in Timmins but grew up in Hamilton. He attended Beth Jacob Synagogue religious school and Westdale Collegiate. He graduated from MacMaster University with a BA in economics in 1962 and obtained his PhD at the University of Chicago. In 1969, he joined the faculty of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

He was awarded the Nobel Prize for his part in developing the Black-Scholes option pricing model, a formula which prices stock options and derivatives, and revolutionized modern finance in the 1970s.

The fund was set up by Federation to provide funding for the many programs and projects now funded by the United Jewish Appeal (UJA), said federation executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppei.

Hamilton, she said, is part of the first tri-city endowment plan, the first ever such plan in Canada. The plan has four partners: the communities of Hamilton, London and Windsor and United Israel Appeal (UIA) Canada. Fund director is Frank Simkevitz.

The celebration takes place Sept. 16, 8 p.m., at the home of Irving Zucker.

Parents start new school

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A group of south Winnipeg parents, dissatisfied with the religious education offered by the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education, (BJE) is starting its own school this fall.

"We have eight 4 and 5-year-olds registered so far, with two or three more possibilities, and we have hired two teachers," says Dr. Debbie Gross, one of the parents involved.

The school is being housed in the newly renovated basement of the Herzlia Synagogue (where most of the families are members), but it will be operating under the aegis of Chabad's north Winnipeg Oholei Torah.

Rabbi Avrohom Altein and his wife Bracha, will be overseeing the morning davening and brachot and the weekly parsha lesson. Gross emphasizes, however, that this will not be a Chabad school.

"We will have a little more Hebrew and Zionism in our school than what Chabad usually teaches," she points out. "There will also be a lot of parental involvement in the classroom, especially in the first two months."

The plan is for the school to grow year by year, possibly up to a Grade 6 level.

The parents have not yet closed the door on the idea of returning to the BJE system if the BJE increases its religious content in the lower grades.

War crimes unit proceeding at record pace: Sher

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The War Crimes Unit in Ottawa has "turned the corner" and is trying harder than it ever has – and at a record pace – to revoke the citizenship of and deport Nazis who lied to get into Canada, a leading American Nazi hunter said here last week.

And it's doing this despite the unprecedented efforts of some Canadians of east European descent to protest the unit's latest impetus, which has resulted in some 15 deportation cases to date.

"If I didn't believe this was so, I wouldn't be here," Neal Sher, the former director of the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations (OSI), told a crowd of 400 at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

Sher also revealed that the U.S. government could be getting set to renew the case against John Demjanjuk, the retired Cleveland auto worker accused and then acquitted by Israel of being Ivan the Terrible, the infamous Nazi guard at the Treblinka death camp.

"We have every reason to believe that the U.S.government will renew and continue the case," he said.

Last January, Sher was hired by the unit to lend his expertise, the result he said, of an appearance he made on the public television show, The Editors, that was embarrassing to the Canadian government.

Sher said his work with the unit has been to try to make it more proactive.

Now, he said, the office has become much more aggressive, with a changed staff and a more dedicated attitude.

It is processing cases at an even quicker pace than the OSI at the moment, he said.

"I wouldn't be on board," he said, "if the Canadian government was not serious."

"Whenever I set foot in the offices in Ottawa, I feel like I'm back home again at the OSI."

Sher would not elaborate on the measures he was taking to make the Unit more proactive, other than to say that the "possibilities are exciting and could bear terrific fruit."

The improvement of the unit has been such that the relationship between it and one of its harshest former critics, Canadian Jewish

Neal Sher

Congress [CJC], has "grown closer," Sher said.

He also praised CJC and the synagogue's Rabbi Reuben Poupko, for their efforts in rallying the Canadian Jewish community to lobby Ottawa for more efforts.

Sher, however, blasted organized efforts on the part of some east European groups to "close down" the unit.

As long as the unit was viewed as a "paper tiger," Sher said, "there was no need for them to go on the offensive." But once he came on board, Sher said, they began an intensive e-mail and letter-writing campaign that has not abated.

They claim that the government is targeting specific communities, he said. But "that's nonsense. They go after individuals," and they're doing a "disservice" to their own communities.

Asked later about the Demjanjuk case, in which a U.S. district court said OSI lawyers were guilty of misconduct by acting with a "reckless disregard for the truth," Sher bristled.

First, he said, although the Israeli Supreme Court acquitted Demjanjuk, it also concluded that he was involved in persecuting Jews in some other capacity.

Sher said a U.S. district court judge, whose name he did not disclose, attacked the OSI because its former director, Allan Ryan, travelled to Israel at Jewish community expense.

But Ryan had left the OSI three years earlier, Sher said.

The evening was also marked by the first address delivered in Montreal by new Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen of Toronto.

In his prepared remarks, Ronen, while hopeful about Ottawa's apparent change of attitude, called Canada's previous history vis-à-vis war criminals, "a stain on our nation."

A child of survivors, Ronen pledged to continue to fight anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, and to "push Canadian authorities to effective action."

To applause, Ronen said Jews "will never again be helpless and dependent. We will never again be dispensable. Jewish blood will never be spilled without a price.

"We can say this today, because Jewish life continues, with the State of Israel reborn."

The evening was attended by Israeli consul general Daniel Gal and also included remarks by Rabbi Poupko, CJC national director Jack Silverstone, Quebec region chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard, and Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre director Bill Surkis.

Winnipeg Jewish Theatre schedule

The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre is entering its second decade with a series of five diverse plays that will appeal to many people.

Make Yourself At Home. This play written by Yitzhak Meshel and directed by Howard Rypp kicks off the season. The romantic comedy stars two Israeli actors and examines the unbreakable bond between Israel and the Diaspora.

(Sept. 9-12, Berney Theatre, Asper Jewish Community Centre.)

The Immigrant. Written by Mark Harelik and directed by Robb Paterson, this nostalgic biographical tale entertains with humor and charm. It is based on the life of Harelik's grandfather, one of a pair of European Jews who immigrate to a small North American town.

(Oct. 15-25, WJT Mainstage Season at the Warehouse Theatre.)

Diary of a Skokie Girl. Possessing a sweet, universal appeal, this play is sure to lift your winter blues. Comedian Caryn Bark wrote and stars in this one-woman show that chronicles the life of a young girl growing up in a Jewish neighborhood.

(Dec.2-6, Berney Theatre.)

Ghetto Tango. Written by Zalmen Mlotek and Adrienne Cooper, this is a powerful, sophisticated experience that received critical acclaim in Toronto, New York City and Amsterdam. The production celebrates the music composed in the '30s and '40s by European Jewish composers and sung in pre-war theatres, ghetto cabarets and partisan encampments.

(April 10, 11, Berney Theatre.)

Social Security. A middle-aged childless couple finds its existence shattered when the woman's sister drops their 80-year-old mother off "for a while." Writer Andrew Bergman uses his comic genius to put a hilarious spin on the dilemma. Bergman has written such screenplays as Blazing Saddles and Fletch. Directed by Kayla Gordon.

Single-play tickets at the WJT Mainstage cost between $18-25 and $30-$44 for a two-play subscription.

Berney Theatre tickets for subscribers are $15, $28, and $36 for one, two or all three plays respectively. For non-subscribers tickets are $18 for each play.

השפעת לוינסקי על השלום:

כל ארבע שנים העולם עובר לדום. וכל מה שקורה על כדור הארץ יוצא לחופשה שנמשכת כמעט חודש. וההווה לשלושים הימים בהם אזרחי תבל חוץ מתושבי ארה"ב והפרובינציה הצפונית, מרותקים למסך הטלביזיה במעקב צמוד אחרי ארבעים וארבע רגלים מוצקות שרודפות על כרי דשא מטופחים אחרי כדור עגול. למי שעדיין לא ניחש - הכוונה למונדיאל. מאחר שאני מעריץ נלהב של האירוע המפואר, החלטתי השנה לעבור את החויה בארץ נאורה בה כדורגל זוכה להערכה ראויה. וכך מצאתי עצמי מרותק למסך הקטן של רשות השידור ויחד עם חברים מהילדות לא החמצתי אפילו משחק אחד. אפילו עשן הסיגריות (בישראל כולם מעשנים) וקיטורי הנשים לא הצליחו לפגוע בחוויה. ואני חייב לציין שהצפיה מלווה בפיצוחים, בורקס, גלידות וויכוחים ללא סוף. היה שווה כל אגורה ממחיר כרטיס הטיסה. וכאן כדאי להוסיף שבימי המשחקים מדינת ישראל כמעט שבקה חיים. על בתי הקולנוע ירדה שממה, ונורד דומה נפל בחלקם של בתי קפה, מסעדות פאבים ואתרי בילוי אחרים. אפילו כבישי ישראל שנראים בדרך כלל כמו חניונים, לבשו בגדי חג. גם בדרום לבנון שחילופי אש כבדים כבר מזמן הפכו להיות שם שיגרה, המרגמות, התותחים ומטעני הצד לקחו פסק זמן ועל השטח ירדה דממה בשעות השידורים מצרפת, שהרי גם לחיזבאללה יש סולם עדיפויות בו כדורגל קודם לאידיאל. וכאשר אירן ניצחה את הדוד סם כדורים נותבים האירו את שמי הגליל ואת שאגות השמחה אפשר היה לשמוע עד אילת. ושמעתי גם סיפור מעד ראיה שבחתונה אחת אומללה שנערכה לרוע המזל בערב שבו הולנד נפגשה עם ברזיל, מיד לאחר טקס החופה החתן, אבין ואבי הכלה הצטרפו לשאר האורחים ממין זכר ועצו במישחק על מסך בחדר סמוך. ורק בגס לא הסתימה החגיגה בגירושין. ולסיום אני מקוה שעד המונדיאל הבא יגלו הקנדים שחוץ מהוקי ובייסבול יש גם כדורגל, והמשחק יזכה כאן להערכה ראויה כך שלא נצטרך לטוס לישראל כדי להנות מהחוויה.

Research study to examine colon cancer among Jews

OTTAWA — A major medical research study on colon cancer is about to move into high gear in Ottawa.

The study will examine the incidence and some of the risk factors for colon (colorectal) cancer in Ottawa's Jewish community to determine if some individuals or families are more genetically predisposed than others to the disease.

Study leader Dr. Hartley Stern, research director of the Loeb Research Institute's Hereditary Colon Cancer Program and chief of surgery at the Ottawa Hospital, hopes identifying high-risk candidates will make possible the prevention of some occurrences of the disease.

The Jewish component of the study is significant: while the lifetime risk of colon cancer in North America's general population is approximately six percent, in some Ashkenazi Jewish communities the incidence may be two to three times higher.

Stern chose Ottawa's Jewish community because of its relatively stable and predominately Ashkenazi population. Ninety-five percent of Ottawa's 13,000 Jews are of Ashkenazi descent.

Stern hopes to identify those most likely to develop the disease by isolating its risk factors, particularly the 1307 APC mutation which occurs more frequently in the Ashkenazi Jewish population than in other groups.

Most importantly, the study offers an opportunity to measure the effectiveness of colonoscopy as a screening test for colon cancer, researchers say.

Cancer genetics is a relatively new field of research, and this study will be the first in North America to proactively target a Jewish community.

The project is being funded privately by members of the community.

The study's first stage will start with the circulation of an information brochure in Ottawa shuls during the High Holy Days.

Further information and a brief screening questionnaire will be mailed to adult members of the Jewish community shortly afterwards. After this initial screening, those who meet participation criteria will be asked to attend a group information session where a family history questionnaire will be provided and testing for the 1307 APC mutation will commence.

Genetic counselling will be offered to all participants to ensure the ramifications of taking part in the study are clearly understood. Participation is completely voluntary, but the more participants, the more valid and authoritative the results, researchers note.

A second five-to-six-year followup phase is expected.

For further project information, call research nurse Sheila Viertelhausen at 613-798-5555, ext. 5008.

Garden tour planned to raise funds for hospital

TORONTO – The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation has launched its first Gardens of Inspiration-Town and Country Tour in celebration of the Max Tanenbaum Garden which recently opened on the hospital's rooftop.

The Max Tanenbaum Garden is a gift to Princess Margaret Hospital by the Tauba and Solomon Spiro Family Foundation for the use of patients, their families, staff and volunteers.

Tauba Spiro's father was the late Max Tanenbaum, a Jewish philanthropist.

The 8,000 foot garden, named in his memory, is located on the 16th floor of the Princess Margaret Hospital. It is the first and only hospital rooftop garden in Toronto.

The gardens were created by landscape architect Neil Turnbull, who will lead the tour in support of cancer care at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Its structure is based on a hexagon, which symbolizes the strength of rock crystals and the health and activity of the beehive. The hexagonal floor pattern, planters and seating areas are made of ipe, a fire-resistant, plantation-grown Brazilian dense hardwood.

The garden's chapel and lanterns were designed and fabricated by sculptors Lynda and Ron Baird.

The fundraising event will take place Sept. 13 from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. Participants will receive breakfast and a picnic lunch while touring two distinctly different gardens.

After touring the gardens, guests will be transported by bus to one of North America's most spectacular private gardens, situated on a 300-acre country estate near Port Perry.

Tickets are $200 per person, and a portion will be tax deductible.

For more information and to reserve tickets, call 946-4661.

Vatican silent on Auschwitz cross controversy

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Ignoring pleas from Israel's chief rabbis, the Vatican has decided to stay on the sidelines in the escalating crisis over the more than 150 crosses placed by Polish Roman Catholic militants at Auschwitz.

A Vatican spokesperson said it was unlikely that Polish-born Pope John Paul II would make a pronouncement on the issue or that the Vatican would soon express a public position.

"The matter is not under the jurisdiction of the Vatican," the spokesperson said in an interview. "We refer everyone to the Polish bishops."

But neither the Polish bishops nor the Polish government has so far been able to defuse a crisis that has chilled Polish-Jewish relations, embarrassed Poland internationally and increasingly assumed powerful nationalist and anti-Semitic overtones.

Last week, Roman Catholic militants defied the Polish Bishops Council, the highest body of the Polish Roman Catholic Church, and erected two more wooden crosses outside the Auschwitz walls.

Kazimierz Switon, the leader of the militants, complained in an interview with CNN that "Jews cannot tell Poles what to do" on their own soil.

The CNN report, seen all over the world, also showed skinheads erecting crosses at the site.

The Polish Bishops Council had called for the removal of the 150 crosses that have been set up there in the past month and urged that no more be erected.

They said, however, that a 26-foot-high cross that has stood there since 1988, and which was used by the pope during a mass at Birkenau in 1979, should stay in place.

The bishops warned in a statement that the crisis is hurting both the Polish Church and Poland itself.

"Escalating the conflict brings harm to the church and turns against our homeland," the statement said. It added that the campaign of erecting crosses at Auschwitz "painfully harms the different sensitivity of our brothers, the Jews."

Poland's chief rabbi, Rabbi Pinchas Menachem Joskowicz, rejected the bishops' stand, reiterating that all crosses, including the papal cross, must go. The presence of any cross prevents Jews from praying at Auschwitz, he said.

"We Jews suffered there the most, so I think it would be bad if in this sacred place we could not pray for our nation, our relatives, our friends and for all who suffered there," said Rabbi Joskowicz, a Holocaust survivor.

At least 1.5 million people, some 90 percent of them Jews, were killed by the Nazis at Auschwitz.

Throughout the world, Auschwitz is regarded as the symbol of the Holocaust and the biggest Jewish graveyard. Jews say no religious symbols should be placed there.

But tens of thousands of Polish Catholics were also killed at Auschwitz, and Poles regard the camp as the symbol of Polish suffering under the Nazis.

The militants began placing the crosses last month, ostensibly to protest the possible removal of the so-called papal cross to another location. They also say the crosses commemorate 152 Catholic Poles killed there by the Nazis.

Polish officials and church leaders have come under pressure from Israel and from Jewish organizations in the United States to resolve the crisis. The American pressure is coming from a coalition of groups led by Miles Lerman, chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

The coalition has been attempting to work out a deal with the Polish government on how to protect and preserve Auschwitz-Birkenau, but has made removal of the crosses a prerequisite to further discussions.

Death threats prompt increased security for PM

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Security around Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has increased in the wake of death threats from right-wing extremists opposed to his ceding any more of the West Bank to the Palestinians.

Taking the threats seriously, the premier has begun wearing a bullet-proof vest and is limiting his public appearances, according to Israeli media reports.

The Shin Bet has also beefed up protection for other top Israeli officials, including President Ezer Weizman and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

Netanyahu's spokesperson, David Bar-Illan, cited the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin as a reason for taking the threats seriously.

Jewish extremists in the West Bank town of Hebron are among those being questioned by the Shin Bet for allegedly being behind some of the threats.

Tensions involving Hebron's Jewish settlers have increased after a rabbi was slain in his mobile home by a suspected Palestinian intruder.

Last Sunday, Israel lifted a 24-hour curfew on Palestinians living in the Israeli-controlled part of Hebron. The curfew, which affected some 30,000 Palestinians, was imposed after the slaying of Rabbi Shlomo Ra'anan. Israel lifted a closure on travel to and from Hebron last week.

There is also growing concern among security officials that right-wing extremists may try to sabotage Islamic sites on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem to create a crisis with the Palestinians.

Meanwhile, Transportation Minister Shaul Yahalom of the National Religious Party demanded at last week's cabinet session that the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations be suspended entirely until the Palestinian Authority cracks down on terrorists.

Netanyahu responded with some unusually positive words about the self-rule government: Contrary to the situation in the past, he said, there is now no evidence of co-operation between the Palestinian Authority and Hamas militants.

Bomb injures at least 21

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials stepped up security in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem after a bomb filled with nails exploded on a busy Tel Aviv street during a morning rush hour last week.

At least 21 people were injured in the attack, including two young children.

The bombing occurred amid reports earlier in the week that progress had been achieved in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

In the wake of the attack, police reinforcements were dispatched to beaches, shopping and entertainment centres, and pedestrian malls in the country's two largest cities. Security checks at Ben-Gurion Airport were intensified.

Israeli leaders of all political stripes were soon demanding that the Palestinian Authority (PA) condemn the attack.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat did so – but only in a private conversation with Knesset member Saleh Tareef of the Labor party.

He said he condemns those who attack Israeli citizens. In the past, Palestinian officials, including Arafat, have made a distinction between Israelis and settlers.

The Palestinian leader also said the explosion may have been the work of common criminals, not terrorists.

Arafat told Tareef that he did not share the optimistic reports published earlier in the week that Israel and the Palestinians were nearing agreement for a further Israeli redeployment in the West Bank. He said there is still a long way to go "because of [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's positions."

Meanwhile Netanyahu warned that unless the PA acts against terrorism "in both deeds and words," there will be no agreement.

He made the comment to reporters while visiting the hospital bedside of one of the attack's victims, Michal Matityah.

The prime minister pointed out that although Arafat has denounced attacks on Israeli citizens, the Palestinian leader has not yet condemned the murders earlier this month of two Israelis in the West Bank because the victims were settlers.

The bomb that exploded last week had been placed in a garbage can at one of Tel Aviv's busiest intersections, the corner of Allenby Street and Rothschild Boulevard.

It was the first attack in Tel Aviv since March 21, 1997, when a Hamas suicide bomber detonated an explosion at the Cafe Apropo, killing three Israelis and wounding 47 others.

"Suddenly a very strong explosion occurred," recalled David Cohen, who was sitting inside a coffee house when the bomb exploded about five feet away. Cohen was only slightly injured.

Only one of the victims, Matityahu, required hospitalization at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv. All the others suffered light injuries.

The explosion, which shattered windows in some 80 apartments and 10 stores, caused damage estimated at $400,000.

Hamas leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin said the explosion was probably the work of Jewish extremists seeking to derail the peace process.

One day before the explosion, Yassin called for attacks on Israel to retaliate for last week's U.S. missile strikes in Sudan and Afghanistan.

A few hours after the explosion in Tel Aviv, thousands of Israelis gathered in the West Bank city of Hebron to mark the end of the shivah period for Rabbi Shlomo Ra'anan, who was killed in his home last week by a suspected Palestinian intruder.

Angry mourners attacked Palestinian reporters who were on the scene to cover the ceremony.

Clashes involving Jewish settlers and Palestinians in Hebron have increased since Ra'anan's murder. Tensions there escalated after the Israeli army responded to the killing by imposing a round-the-clock curfew on the estimated 30,000 Palestinians living in the Israeli-controlled part of the heavily Arab city.

Meanwhile, Israeli officials have disclosed that security forces recently uncovered an underground cell of 20 Palestinians operating in the Hebron region.

The group reportedly confessed to carrying out several shootings on Jewish targets in the West Bank. The cell is said to be part of the Abu-Mussa group, which had split from the mainstream Fatah party and is headquartered in Damascus.

Katyusha attacks test Israel's resolve in Lebanon

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's continued commitment to its military presence in southern Lebanon has been tested again following a series of Katyusha rocket attacks on the Galilee.

Scores of rockets fell last week in Kiryat Shmona and other targets in northern Israel, leaving 14 Israelis wounded and a number of houses damaged. Hezbollah took responsibility for the attacks.

Five hours before the rockets landed, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai warned the Shiite Amal militia and Hezbollah not to try to retaliate.

The rocket barrage came after Israeli helicopters made a raid near the southern Lebanese city of Tyre, killing Hussam al-Amin, a high-level official with Amal, which is generally less militant than Hezbollah.

The Israeli operation appears to have united Amal and Hezbollah, which are often at odds. The two Shiite groups reportedly launched the Katyusha barrage jointly.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu convened several top advisers to discuss an initiative he has pushed for months: an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon in exchange for guarantees that the Lebanese government would be responsible for security in the area.

Netanyahu is reportedly planning to discuss the initiative during a planned visit to New York in September, when the UN General Assembly convenes for its annual session.

Although Israel anticipated the possibility of a rocket assault after its helicopter raid, residents of Kiryat Shmona were instructed to take cover in shelters only after the first rockets were fired.

Two wedding ceremonies were interrupted by the assault, as the celebrants fled for cover.

Israel condemned the rocket attacks, saying they were contrary to the understandings reached in a ceasefire brokered by the United States in April 1996 in an effort to protect civilians on both sides of the Israeli-Lebanese border.

Israeli officials maintain this week's operation against al-Amin did not violate those understandings because it was aimed at a military person and not at civilians.

Hezbollah officials claimed in turn that Lebanese villagers were hurt during exchanges of gunfire in southern Lebanon.

Israel's opposition leader, Ehud Barak of the Labor party, gave qualified support to the Israeli helicopter operation that led to the Katyusha reprisals.

He said that if the army saw fit to attack al-Amin at this time and in this fashion, he was confident that it had to be done. But at the same time, he stressed that it is necessary to find a political solution for southern Lebanon.

The situation in Lebanon was high on the agenda of Israel's inner cabinet meeting last week. Most of the ministers said Israel should act with restraint in the wake of the rocket assaults and try to restore quiet to the region.

Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, however, said Israel should launch reprisal raids against infrastructure targets, such as power plants, in and around Beirut.

"As long as Jewish families lose their sons in Lebanon, there is no reason why there should be business as usual in Beirut and why they should enjoy the regular supply of electricity," said Kahalani, who is a fierce advocate of settlements in the northern Golan region.

Some military experts said they saw no strategic advantages to the killing of al-Amin.

Trouble in Russia feared

in Russia.

Sharon Zeiler, director of the Toronto regional office, said JIAS clients here are calling the office to find out how loved ones and relatives can be brought out.

"There's a lot of anxiety. People are concerned," Zeiler said.

The agency, she added, will likely see another spike in immigration from Russia six or eight months from now, as those escaping the current turmoil begin to reach Canada.

HIAS, the international arm of JIAS, has cited anecdotal evidence of ethnic attacks by skinheads, religious discrimination in the workplace, and a pervasive feeling of uneasiness about the durability of human rights protections.

Braun agreed, saying any sensitivities toward minorities in Russia are likely to "evaporate" as the situation deteriorates.

"Negative feelings toward Jews will be amplified," he said, adding that conspiracy theorists – "and there are legions of them" – will look to [blame] certain groups."

High profile Jews in Russia, including first deputy minister Boris Nemtsov, and Boris Beresofsky, a billionaire media mogul, will likely become targets of anti-Semitism, Braun said.

Gennady Zhuganov, the communist leader who wants increased power in exchange for his support of Chernomyrdin, has a long history of being associated with anti-Semites, Braun noted.

So does foreign minister Yevgeny Primakov, who is "rabidly anti-Semitic and anti-Israel," and who is likely to survive current developments.

But Braun does not foresee a return to communism.

"What worries me is some form of authoritarian mix of both the extreme right and the communists."

Mark Levin, executive director of the U.S.-based National Conference on Soviet Jewry, articulated similar concerns about Russia's political and economic uncertainty.

"There are a lot of Jews in the elite of the business and political worlds," he said. "And Jews have always proven to be convenient" targets for societal frustrations in the region.

Oslo needs resuscitation

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

On Sept. 13, 1993, Israel and the PLO signed a historic document known as the Declaration of Principles (DoP), calling a halt to their undeclared war and recognizing each other's existence.

The DoP, the result of many months of secret negotiations in Norway, paved the way for the Oslo peace process, a series of bilateral negotiations designed to provide land for the Palestinians and security for the Israelis.

Five years on, Oslo is badly battered and in dire need of resuscitation, despite the best efforts of the United States to revive it.

Oslo has been in a near-comatose state for about 18 months now, having been buffeted by Palestinian terrorism and Israeli unilateral acts, both of which have produced a crisis of confidence and a virtual breakdown of mutual trust.

Such is the situation that Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister, and Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, are barely on speaking terms, and have not had a meeting in almost a year.

Last week, a flurry of reports suggested that the two sides may be close to breaking the impasse and thus revitalizing Oslo. In a shift of policy, Israel was reportedly ready to accept a long-standing American proposal for a phased 13 percent redeployment from the West Bank in exchange for a further Palestinian crackdown on terrorism.

If this turns out to be the case, Israel and the Palestinian Authority can proceed to final status negotiations, which are more than two years behind schedule.

Oslo, from the outset, has been excoriated by Palestinian and Israeli detractors. Palestinians contend that it does not truly address the issues of Israeli settlements, Palestinian statehood and the rights of refugees to return to their former homes. Israelis, notably those against territorial compromise, claim that it endangers the long-term future of the country.

In fact, Oslo has benefited Israel and the Palestinians. Oslo established a framework for co-existence and cooperation. It prompted Jordan to sign a peace treaty with Israel, and encouraged Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar to enter into relations with Israel. It also induced Turkey to form a quasi-alliance with Israel, and produced a climate conducive to greater foreign investment in Israel.

As a result of Israeli withdrawals, the Palestinians currently have full or partial control of 27 percent of the West Bank and 60 percent of the Gaza Strip. Oslo, too, has put huge sums of money for development at their disposal, and enabled them to forge official ties with the United States, the only superpower.

Oslo's downside is manifestly clear. The suicide bombings unleashed by Palestinian opponents of the accords, mainly Islamic fundamentalists, have taken a shocking toll of Israeli lives and exacerbated profound rifts in Israeli society, fissures which led to Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in November 1995.

The spate of terrorism, having forced Israel to periodically seal off the autonomous Palestinian areas, has in turn engendered bitterness and dashed hopes for prosperity among ordinary Palestinians.

Netanyahu's profoundly ambivalent approach to Oslo, combining distaste with pragmatism, has widened the chasm between Israelis and Palestinians. Elected on a platform espousing "peace with security," he has slowed down the pace of the process and put the Palestinians on notice that they must lower their expectations.

For a variety of reasons, Netanyahu has taken provocative unilateral steps which have breached the spirit, though not the letter, of Oslo. Har Choma, the planned residential housing neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem, has inflamed Palestinian opinion. So has the expansion of settlements beyond the Green Line.

The Palestinians, for their part, have not consistently fought terrorism, and their hostile propaganda and disinclination to completely revise their national covenant calls into question their commitment to abide fully by the Oslo agreements.

Diary lawsuit threatened

the previously expurgated sections, was published in the United States, but it is now possible that a new edition will be produced.

Following are the excerpts from Anne Frank's diary that appeared in Het Parool:

"Dear Kitty,

"Since I seem to have plenty of time to think these days... my thoughts turned quite naturally to father and mother's marriage. They always held it up to me as an example of an ideal marriage... I get the impression that father married mother because he found her suitable to occupy the place as his wife... It can't be easy for a woman who loves her husband to know that she'll never come first in his heart... Father respects mother and loves her, but it's not the love that I imagine in a marriage...

"Father isn't in love, he kisses her the way he kisses us, and he never holds her up as an example, because he can't. He sometimes looks at her teasingly or mockingly, but never lovingly... She loves him more than she loves anyone else, and it is hard to accept that this sort of love will always be unrequited."

Former UN arms inspector denies working for Israel

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A seven-year veteran of the U.N. inspection team monitoring weapons in Iraq is denying that he shared classified information on Saddam Hussein's weapons program with various countries, including Israel.

Scott Ritter, who is under investigation by the FBI for allegedly leaking classified U.S. documents, has meanwhile quit the UN weapons inspection commission for Iraq, known as UNSCOM. In a scathing resignation letter, he accused the Security Council and the United States of making a "mockery" of the program.

Israeli officials had no direct comment on the charges. One Israeli official said the Clinton administration notified the Israeli Embassy in Washington earlier this week about the investigation.

When asked whether he is an Israeli agent, Ritter, who did not respond to a request for an interview, told CNN that there is "no truth to that whatsoever."

Ritter's colleagues reportedly said the FBI probe contributed to his decision to leave the UN post. These colleagues also defended Ritter, telling the Washington Post that he stands on solid ground in his fight against the FBI.

Sources said Ritter's information-sharing was explicitly authorized by the head of the weapons inspection program, Richard Butler, and his predecessor. In addition, because Ritter did not maintain his American security clearances, any U.S. information provided to him was declassified, the Post reported.

FBI investigating leaks

Butler did not comment directly on the FBI investigation. He did however, call Ritter a "man of integrity."

Ritter is likely to face questions next week at a speaking engagement at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Ritter worked at UNSCOM's New York headquarters from 1991 to 1998. During the past two years, he frequently drew the ire of Iraqi officials as he tried to uncover Iraqi attempts to conceal its remaining capabilities to develop missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

After Ritter resigned, Iraq claimed to have exposed his links to the Mossad and the Central Intelligence Agency.

"The resignation of the American-Zionist intelligence officer Scott Ritter from the Special Commission is because his connection with the Zionist Mossad was uncovered," the Iraqi Ministry of Culture and Information said in a statement.

"Scott Ritter is an intelligence officer at the American army and had taken part in the American imperialist aggression against Iraq in 1991," the statement said. "All plans of the special commission and its programs, and the behavior of its chairman and its competent members are hatched in American and Zionist intelligence rooms."

Discovery Place now at the Ex

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An exciting new museum just for kids is going to open next month at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. But you don't have to wait until then to see it.

Just go to the Israel 50 exhibit at the CNE, and you will find it all set up.

The name of the museum is My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum, and it will open officially on October 18. It is a hands-on museum, which means that you don't just look at the exhibits, like you do in most museums - you can actually touch things, play with things, and have a really good time.

There are all sorts of different sections. In People Helping People, sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital, you can travel to the "hospital" in a mini-ambulance or mini-helicopter, try on casts, use a stethoscope, deal with an emergency, and make a get-well card for someone who is sick.

You can put on a space suit, explore outer space, and find Hebrew letters in the stars. Reena is sponsoring You, Me and Dignity. In that section, you can see what it is like to have a disability, and how technology can help. You can try to identify something using your sense of touch, try a braille typewriter, try a wheelchair, or learn sign language as deaf people do or how to use a TTY machine (which lets deaf people use the telephone).

Children can play in Noah's Ark, which sounds like a lot of fun, thanks to Jewish Family & Child Service. In the ark, you can even put on a costume and pretend to be an elephant, or watch a puppet show.

At The Shabbat Table, which a lady named Helen Finder-Guttman sponsored, people will learn how to light candles, say kiddush, and braid challah.

Have you ever bought trees for Israel, or put money in the Jewish National Fund (JNF) blue box? JNF is supporting a special exhibit on Israel, called Happy Birthday Dear Israel (remember - this is Israel's 50th birthday). It will be fun to pick oranges on a kibbutz, put a note in the Kotel, and find out about all the plants and animals that you would find in Israel.

At Torah Time, you can tie tzitzit knots (by using a kind of macrame) go to a child-size shul, and try on tfillin.

There will be special events for the different holidays, storytelling, arts and crafts, dancing, and singalongs.

The whole museum is supposed to be for children between 3 and 11, but older kids will have a great time here, and so will your parents. It is really for the whole family to enjoy.

Once the museum is operating, there will be school tours, group programs, and all sorts of special events and programs.

My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum was started in Los Angeles. That museum has sent exhibits all over the United States and Canada, and now a permanent exhibit will remain in Toronto.

The museum will be open Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday from 10 to 5, Friday 10 to 2, and on Sunday from 10 to 3. Admission will be $2 per person, whether you are a child or an adult.

FOOD IDEAS FOR

ROSH HASHANAH

Rosh Hashanah a time for sweet dishes

By JUDITH GELLER MARLOW
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah customs include preparing sweet dishes and eating round challah.

Sephardi traditions also include eating black-eyed peas, chick peas, rice and couscous. Green vegetables and olives are an important part of the holiday tradition.

Nothing bitter tasting should be served this time of year.

The following recipes may be incorporated into your High Holy Day menu.

ROAST SALMON WITH SPICED ONIONS AND CURRANTS

½ cup currants
¼ cup kosher cognac
4 tbsp. olive oil
4 large onions, sliced ¼ inch thick (about 6 cups)
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
½ tsp. salt, plus additional for the fish
¼ tsp. freshly ground pepper, plus additional for the fish
4 salmon fillets, about 3 oz. each for an appetizer, 6 oz. each for a main course
½ cup pareve chicken stock

Soak currants in cognac and ¼ cup water until softened and plump, about 30 minutes.

Heat oil in a large saute pan or skillet over medium heat. Add onions and cook until very tender and translucent, about 20 minutes. Stir in the spices, reduce the heat to low and cook for just a few minutes to meld the flavors. Stir in the currants, and salt and pepper. Taste and adjust seasonings. Set aside.

Preheat the oven to 450. Divide the onion mixture into 4 piles in a baking dish. Place each salmon fillet on top of a pile of onions and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Spoon the pareve chicken stock over the salmon and bake until the fish is just cooked through, 7-12 minutes, depending on the thickness of the fillets.

Vegetarians may use a vegetable or fish stock instead of chicken stock.

Also, you may poach or broil the salmon fillets and then serve the warm onion mixture on top as a sauce.Garnish the plate with leafy baby greens.

ORANGES WITH ORANGE ZEST AND HONEY

6 large oranges
½ cup water
1 cup sugar
¼ cup honey
¼ cup kosher orange liqueur
2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint
¼ cup chopped pistachios or almonds

Remove the bright orange zest of the oranges with a potato peeler (try not to get the bitter white pith) and cut into thin julienne strips. Bring a saucepan of water to a boil, add the julienne and blanch 2-3 minutes. Drain and refresh in cold water. Set aside.

Cut off all the white pith from the oranges with a small knife. Then remove the segments by cutting between the membranes. Place the peeled orange segments in a bowl and set aside.

Combine the water, sugar and honey in a saucepan and cook over high heat, stirring, until the sugar has dissolved. Continue cooking until the syrup thickens and measures about 230 on a candy thermometer. Let the syrup cool for a few minutes, stir in the blanched zest and pour over the orange segments. Add the orange liqueur, the mint, or nuts, if you like. Serve at room temperature. Serves 6.

RICE & CHEESE CROQUETTES WITH TOMATO AND GREEN OLIVE SAUCE

Croquettes:
3 cups cooked and cooled short-grain rice
1 cup shredded kosher mozzarella
1 chopped fresh oregano leaves (or ½ tsp. dried)
3 large eggs
½ cup grated kosher Parmesan
1 cup dry bread crumbs
olive oil for frying

For the sauce:
2 tbsp. olive oil
½ cup chopped onion
1 large clove garlic, peeled
28 oz. can whole plum tomatoes with juice
2 tbsp. each chopped fresh basil and parsley (or 1 tbsp. dried)
1 tbsp. chopped fresh oregano leaves (or ½ tsp. dried) salt and ground pepper
½ cup sliced, pitted green olives

In a mixing bowl, combine the rice, mozzarella and oregano. Mix well. Add 1 of the eggs and stir to thoroughly combine. In a small bowl, beat the remaining 2 eggs lightly. Place the Parmesan and bread crumbs on separate pieces of waxed paper. Line a tray or baking sheet with waxed paper.

Pick up some of the rice mixture in your hand and squeeze it until it holds together. If it won't hold together, stir a tbsp. of flour into the rice mixture. Form the lump in your hand into a patty and dredge it gently in the Parmesan, coating both sides. Shake off the excess.

Coat the croquette with the beaten egg, then the bread crumbs and place it on the prepared tray. Don't worry if the edges are ragged at this point. Continue making and coating croquettes until all the rice mixture is used. You should have 8 3-inch or 12 2-inch croquettes.

Place the tray in the refrigerator and chill for 1 to 3 hours.

Heat the oil in a saucepan over medium heat. Saute the onion until tender and translucent, 3 to 5 minutes. Add the garlic and saute 1 minute more.

Add the tomatoes, basil, oregano, salt and pepper. Raise the heat and bring the sauce to a boil, breaking up the tomatoes against the side of the pan to break them up, for 15-20 minutes, or until thickening somewhat.

Stir in the olives and heat 2 minutes more. Serve immediately over fried croquettes or cover and set aside to be gently reheated at serving time.

Heat oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Remove the croquettes from the refrigerator and smooth any rough edges between your palms. Fry the croquettes until golden, 3-5 minutes a side.

Drain on paper towels. Serve immediately with tomato-olive sauce, garnished with parsley. Serves 4-6.

Plenty of uses for apples

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

As the holidays draw closer, our thoughts are drawn to the year just past, and then inevitably, what foods we are going to serve.

I wish everyone a happy, healthy sweet year, as well as a year filled with great recipes. With this in mind I raided my files for the best apple recipes I could find, and as my new year's gift I'm giving them to you.

GRATED APPLE PIE

1¼ cups sugar
3 tbsp. flour
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg
2 eggs, beaten
½ cup melted margarine
1 tsp. vanilla
3 cup (4 medium) grated apples
1 pie shell, unbaked

Preheat oven to 400. Combine sugar, flour, cinnamon, and nutmeg. Add eggs, margarine, and vanilla. Fold in apples. Pour mixture into pie shell. Bake for 10 minutes. Lower temperature to 350 and bake for 60 to 65 minutes. Cool.

APPLE ACORN SQUASH SOUP

4 lb. butternut or acorn squash
3 cup chicken broth (or vegetable broth to keep it pareve)
¼ cup margarine
1 large onion diced
4 tart apples peeled and diced
salt to taste

Peel squash: cut into large chunks, removing and discarding all seeds and fibers. Put broth into large saucepan or soup pot and add squash pieces. Bring to a boil over high heat; then lower heat, cover and simmer 20-25 min. or until squash is very tender.

Meanwhile, melt margarine in a large skillet or saucepan over med-high heat; then saute onion until tender, but not browned. Add the apples and saute until tender.

In batches, using a blender or food processor fitted with steel blade, process apples, onion, and baked squash broth so the mixture can be easily pureed. (Reserve the remaining broth.)

Stir the pureed mixture back into the pot containing the reserved broth. If the soup is too thick, stir in additional broth as desired. (The soup may be made ahead to this point.) Shortly before serving, reheat the soup, stirring often. Season with salt if desired.

APPLE BANANA BREAD

½ cup butter or margarine softened
2 cup flour
¼ cup brown sugar
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ cup sugar
1 tbsp. baking soda
2 eggs
½ tsp. cinnamon
3 tbsp. sour cream
2 apples cored, chopped
1 banana, mashed
½ cup walnuts chopped
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Cream butter and sugars and beat in eggs. Stir in sour cream, banana and vanilla.

In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder, soda and cinnamon. Gradually add to butter mixture. Gently stir in apples and nuts. Spoon into greased bread pan and bake 1 hour.

APPLE PIZZA

Crust
2 ¾ cup flour
1 package dry yeast
3 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. salt
½ cup water
¼ cup milk
¼ cup butter
1 egg

Apple Topping
2 tbsp. butter
2 large tart apples
½ cup sugar
2 tbsp. flour
1 tsp. cinnamon

Cheese Topping
4 oz. cream cheese
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ tsp. nutmeg

Streusel Topping
⅓ cup flour
⅓ cup sugar
¼ cup soft butter

Blend 1½ cup flour, yeast, sugar and salt in a large mixing bowl. Heat water, milk and butter until very warm; add to flour mixture and beat three minutes.

By hand, stir in enough flour to make a soft dough. Cover and let rise 15 minutes.

Pat dough onto a large oiled pizza pan, forming a rim around the edge. Mix the cheese topping and spread it on.

Peel and slice apples. Melt butter in skillet; add apples, sugar, flour and cinnamon. Simmer 15 minutes, then set aside to cool. Spread apple topping over cheese.

In a separate bowl mix the streusel topping ingredients together and sprinkle it over the top. Cover and let rise for 15 min. Bake at 375, 25-30 minutes. Serve warm or cold.

APPLE CHICKEN SALAD

Marinade:
¼ cup frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed
2 tbsp. oil
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. kosher white wine vinegar
1 tbsp. dried savory, crushed
4 boneless skinless chicken breast halves

Dressing:
¼ cup mayonnaise or salad dressing
¼ cup apple juice concentrate
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Salad:
3 cups torn romaine lettuce
2 cups torn red leaf lettuce
½ cups broken pecans or walnuts
⅓ cup red onion, diced
2 medium apples, cored & sliced

For marinade: In a small bowl combine the apple juice concentrate, salad oil, soy sauce, vinegar, and savory.

For chicken: Place chicken breasts in a plastic bag in a shallow dish. Pour marinade over chicken. Close bag. Refrigerate about 4 hours, turning once. Remove meat, reserving marinade. Pat chicken dry with paper towels.

Place chicken on a rack of an unheated broiler pan. Broil about 4 to 6 inches from heat for 8 to 10 minutes or until tender, brushing occasionally with reserved marinade. (Or grill chicken on an uncovered grill directly over medium-hot coals for 20 to 25 minutes or until tender, turning once.) Remove from heat. Cut chicken into strips. Cover and chill 2 to 24 hours.

For dressing: In a small bowl combine mayonnaise or salad dressing, apple juice concentrate, salt and pepper.

In a large bowl, combine the romaine, red leaf lettuce, pecans or walnuts, and onion. Divide salad greens among 4 dinner plates. Arrange chicken and apples over greens. Drizzle salad dressing over salads.

APPLE-GLAZED BARBECUED CHICKEN

For even more flavor, try marinating the chicken in the glaze before grilling.

1 6-ounce can frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed
¼ cup firmly packed brown sugar
¼ cup ketchup
1 tablespoon cider vinegar
1 teaspoon dried thyme, crumbled
⅛ teaspoon hot pepper sauce (such as Tabasco)
1 3-pound chicken cut into 4 pieces
salt and pepper
vegetable oil

Combine the apple juice, brown sugar, ketchup, vinegar, thyme and hot sauce in heavy small saucepan. Stir over medium heat until sugar dissolves.

Prepare barbecue (medium-high heat). Brush chicken with oil. Season generously with salt and pepper. Grill until chicken is almost cooked through, turning occasionally, about 20 minutes. Brush with glaze and continue grilling until chicken is tender and cooked through, brushing chicken frequently with glaze and turning occasionally, about 10 minutes longer.

Holocaust-themed movies part of T.O. Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO—This year's Toronto International Film Festival, running from Sept. 10-19, features several films of Jewish interest.

They are Apt Pupil, The Giraffe, Life is Beautiful and *Fragments*Jerusalem*.

Apt Pupil, directed by Bryan Singer of The Usual Suspects fame, is based on a novella by Stephen King.

Starring Ian McKellen and Brad Renfro, it portrays the warped and terrifying relationship between a 16-year-old boy and his mild-mannered neighbor, a Nazi war criminal who has swept his unsavory past under the rug.

Like Apt Pupil, The Giraffe, a German-Swiss production directed byDani Levy, unfolds against the backdrop of the Holocaust.

A thriller about two families living in post-war Germany, it turns on the tension between one generation's desire to protect its secrets and another's desire to conceal them.

Another movie dealing with the Holocaust, Robert Benigni's Life is Beautiful, is set in Italy.

This bitter-sweet film demonstrates the power of laughter to bolster sagging spirits, even under the weight of terrible events.

The festival's only Israeli film, Fragments Jerusalem*, is a six-hour epic which traces a Jewish family's roots in that city.

In the words of director Ron Havilio, it is "an attempt to remember people and places which time, wars and the pace of modern life have erased."

Havilio, who spent more than a decade making this documentary, sifts through artifacts, home movies, paintings and photographs to create a portrait of Jerusalem from the waning days of Ottoman rule and the Yishuv's struggle for independence to the post-Six Day War period.

The festival is also presenting a film from Lebanon by Zaid Doueiri entitled West Beirut. It is about three adolescents growing up in that strife-torn metropolis.

Piers Handling, the festival director, told a news conference last week that 311 films from 53 countries will be screened.

Of these, 144 films will have their world and North American premieres at the 23rd edition of the festival.

Popular singer David Broza in car accident

Popular Israeli singer-songwriter David Broza was recently involved in a serious car accident.

The incident occurred about three weeks ago after a late-night concert at Avdat, Israel, marking the Tu b'Av Night of Love festivities. The car Broza was riding in crashed into electric poles when the driver fell asleep.

Broza, 43, suffered five broken ribs, a broken shoulder, head injuries and a punctured lung. Perhaps the most serious injury, however, was partial paralysis in both his hands.

Broza is well-known for his flamenco-influenced guitar playing.

Although Broza has cancelled all performances for the remainder of the year, doctors believe Broza's hands will recover and he will be able to play again.

Singer Ronit Schachar and Broza's stage crew were also in the car but escaped injury.

Broza was conscious while being rushed to Kaplan Hospital in Rehovot and remembers singing as the medical staff tended to his injuries.

He spent 12 days in hospital and is recuperating in Israel. He is unable to return to his home in New Jersey due to a punctured lung.

Broza has performed frequently in Canada recently. His last appearance here was a Toronto concert with Canadian performers Marc Jordan and Amy Sky in October 1997. He has recorded many albums in English and Hebrew.

Broza's Canadian concert promoter Corey Ross will forward any letters of support from his fans. Letters can be sent to Corey Ross Productions Inc., 9 Humewood Dr. #39, Toronto, Ont. M6C 1C9.

David Broza was seriously injured in a car accident.

Concert for Israeli Hospital: The Canadian Friends of Esrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital are hosting a gala concert featuring violinist Jacques Israelievitch, concert master of the TSO, cellist Shauna Rolston and composer-pianist John Arpin.

Guest of honor is Dr. Stanley Greben. Proceeds to go to Esrath Nashim-Herzog's research into Alzheimer and Parkinson disease.

Saving Private Ryan: The camera pans across a row of graves of soldiers killed in the Allied landing at the Omaha Beach, Normandy on D-Day. Amidst the rows of crosses, several Jewish stars are visible. These are only a few of numerous Jewish touches in Steven Spielberg's latest masterpiece, Saving Private Ryan.

One of the troupe of eight soldiers who go behind enemy lines to rescue Ryan is Pvt. Stanley Mellish, played by 27-year-old actor Adam Goldberg of Los Angeles. Allusions are made to the Jews in several scenes involving Mellish, including one in which he confronts a line of German prisoners of war and proudly proclaims that he, one of their captors, is "ein Jude, ein Jude, ein Jude."

Goldberg, the son of a Jewish father and Catholic mother, also appears in the upcoming Ron Howard film ed TV and has signed a contract with ABC-TV for his own television series.

Trudy Desmond

In the Spotlight: Mellow, melancholy, jazzy, syncopated…there are plenty of fascinating rhythms and creative phrasings in singer Trudy Desmond's new CD, My One and Only: A Gershwin Celebration.

Recorded to honor the centenary of George Gershwin's birth, the CD contains innovative contemporary arrangements of classic tunes such as I Got Rhythm, Somebody Loves Me, They All Laughed and Nice Work If You Can Get It.

Musicians include Bill Mays, Neil Swainson, Ed Bickert, Don Thompson and Ted Quinlan.

The Brooklyn-born Desmond, whose education included 10 years in a yeshiva, lives some of the time in Toronto, but lately she's been on the road with a jazz trio doing a string of live performances.

"I have never performed music so universally loved as Gershwin," she said. "He's allowed me to reach to a different audience. Because if people are nervous about jazz, Gershwin is the common denominator."

My One and Only is Desmond's fourth CD and the easiest one for her to record: the whole project was completed in only a couple of months. "It was just kind of meant to be," she said, adding that the music presented no obstacles to jazzier interpretations.

"That's the beauty of Gershwin's work. The internal structure of his writing allows you to easily slide from style to style without insulting the style of his writing."

The centenary of George Gershwin's birth falls on Sept. 26. Desmond is scheduled to perform in Sault Ste. Marie on that date.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

THE GETTY AND OTHER LOS ANGELES MUSEUMS

Like the recently opened Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, Spain, the new $1 billion Getty Centre made international headlines when it opened last winter in Los Angeles.

Set on a hill in the foothills of the Santa Monica Mountains, along the historic Sepulveda Pass, the unique arts and cultural institution can be seen for miles, and in turn, offers panoramic views of the region from downtown Los Angeles to the Pacific Ocean.

Admission is free to this exquisitely designed complex of six buildings, which house many important works of art. Prize-winning architect Richard Meier described the 110-acre hilltop of the Getty Centre as "the most beautiful site I have ever been invited to build on."

In his design, Meier integrated the curves of the mountains with the squareness of the urban grid, and maintained the sense of spaciousness by keeping the architecture open so as not to block the magnificent view. He used generous amounts of travertine, a stone richly textured with fossils, as well as metal panels and railings to heighten the desired synthesis between the natural and urban environments.

The Getty's permanent collections are housed in five two-story pavilions around a central open courtyard that features fountains, reflecting pools and shade trees. Visitors walk from gallery to gallery, viewing the works of art at their own pace and in whatever order they like.

The paintings include works by Fra Bartolommeo, Mantegna, Pontormo, Rubens, Van Dyck, Poussin, Goya, Van Gogh, Monet, Renoir, Degas and Cezanne; there are also drawings by Michelangelo, Leonardo, Raphael and many others. Other items on view include French-made furniture from the 17th and 18th centuries, tapestries from Gobelins and Beauvais, and sculpture by Cellini, Bernini, Houdon and Canova.

Like the famous Getty Villa in Malibu which is closed for extensive renovations, the Getty Centre requires visitors with cars to reserve parking spots in advance; although the waiting list is months long, spaces sometimes become available due to cancellations.

Since the museum expects to greet roughly 1.3 million visitors in its first year, there can be a long wait to board the free tram up and back down the hill. At times, visitors must also queue to enter the gift shop and even the washrooms. The centre boasts a variety of creative food establishments; an excursion of at least three hours is recommended. 310-440-7360.

More L.A. Museums: Another worthy gallery established by an American mogul and dripping with opulence is the Armand Hammer Museum of Art at 10899 Wilshire Blvd at Westwood Blvd. Hammer, an oil magnate who died in 1990, had promised his personal collection of art to the L.A. County Museum of Art but decided instead to found his own museum. The collection includes works by Toulouse Lautrec, Degas, Rembrandt and Van Gogh, and can easily be viewed in two hours.

The above-mentioned L.A. County Museum of Art (5905 Wilshire Blvd.) is closed on Wednesdays, but when I unknowingly arrived there by cab on a Wednesday afternoon, I was not too perturbed. This, after all, is the stretch of Wilshire Boulevard known as Museum Row.

Soon I was examining the George C. Page Museum of La Brea Discoveries. This fascinating museum (5801 Wilshire Blvd.) displays the skeletal remains of prehistoric animals caught in the oozing tar pits that once covered the neighborhood. The well-preserved skeletal remains of sloths, vultures, mastodons, camels, bears, lizards and even human beings have been retrieved from the La Brea swamp.

At 5900 Wilshire Blvd. is the Carole & Barry Kaye Museum of Miniatures; which bills itself as "the biggest little collection in the world." In this eccentric but fun institution you'll find highly detailed models of everything from the Titanic to the historic palaces of Europe. There are also miniature dollhouses, dolls, cars, furniture, and micro-miniatures such as a camel caravan carved inside the eye of a needle.

The 4-year-old Petersen Automotive Museum, at 6060 Wilshire Blvd., displays more than 200 cars and motorcycles.

Canadian gov't. promotes Territories investment

Will open trade office in Ramallah

BY JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Canadian government is implementing policies and investing resources to boost economic relations between Canada and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

In recent years, there have been several examples of Canada's expanding role in Gaza and the West Bank. Since the Declaration of Principles was signed in 1993, Canada has allocated $95 million to the West Bank and Gaza for a series of projects, primarily through the United Nations.

When the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement was negotiated, goods produced in Gaza and the West Bank were given the same preferential treatment as those produced in Israel.

According to participants in a February 1997 Canadian trade delegation to Israel, government officials encouraged the delegation to also consider business possibilities in the PA region.

In July 1998, following the direction of an update from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT), the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv led a Palestinian trade and investment mission to Canada.

Currently, the document says, a memorandum of understanding on economic cooperation and trade with the PA is being prepared for Canada's minister for International Trade.

A Canadian office staffed by one employee will be opening in Ramallah, in the PA region, in October, says Dexter Bishop, a spokesperson for DFAIT. The office will provide trade advice and economic assistance.

Many opportunities for Canadians in Gaza and the West Bank will likely involve Israeli firms, as Israelis are already doing business in various sectors there.

Bishop says the first step for companies looking at the area is to contact the department's Middle East North Africa Bureau in Ottawa, which will provide background information for doing business in the region.

The next step is to contact the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv to get names of contacts and information about joint venture possibilities and ongoing Canadian economic activity in the region.

Because joint ventures in the PA region require 51 percent local ownership, Bishop says the third and most important step is to "know your partners well.

"Business practices may not resemble our own. Partnership is vital. [Under the rules, Canadians are minority shareholders and] one has to move with that in mind," he says.

While early entrants in the area assume a higher risk than those who come later, such entrepreneurial pioneers "have a better chance of becoming known," Bishop says.

DFAIT was quite bullish on economic opportunities under Palestinian/Israeli control in the aftermath of the Oslo peace accords.

"While the Palestinian economy is smaller and less developed than that of Israel, for some [Canadian exporters], opportunities may be greater," the department wrote in its December 1996 document, Focus on Israel.

There are a number of industrial sectors in which aggressive Canadian companies can profit. One is upgrading municipal infrastructure.

"These offer good opportunities for the construction sector," Focus on Israel pointed out.

Other areas of opportunity include processed food and cut flowers. In vertical markets where Palestinian industries are more developed, strategic alliances are the route to take. This is particularly true in the garment industry, agriculture, pharmaceuticals and health products.

DFAIT officials emphasize the importance of relationship marketing and the need to visit prospective business partners. "Papers, brochures and faxes will be ignored if there is not a face behind them."

The Canadian International Development Agency has provided sanitation equipment to the City of Gaza, while the Montreal firm Hydrosult has provided advice, specifications and construction supervision in Gaza.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities helped Rafah to plan its sewage system, and a further three-year project with Rafah will provide $2.5 million worth of technical assistance and equipment procurement.

The PA has expressed strong interest in a joint venture between Nova Scotia Power and Trycana Development Inc., and has asked them to bid on a sole sources basis to build the World Bank/IFC Gaza power generation project.

A document released by the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto points out that while progress is being made on the economic front, "it is clear that progress is dependent, first and foremost, on a stable security situation as well as cooperation by the Palestinians and the international community."

In a recent report produced by DFAIT, new concerns were raised about the moribund pace of economic development in Gaza and the West Bank. The stalemate in the peace process was blamed.

"Trade potential with the West Bank and Gaza has been severely hampered by difficulties in the peace process," the report says.

DFAIT officials point out that closure of areas under the PA, failure to reach agreement on a corridor between Gaza and the West Bank and the opening of an airport and seaport in Gaza "have had a serious impact on the Palestinian economy."

Information is bank economist's daily bread

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the understated vernacular of bankers, Joshua (Josh) Mendelsohn deals with "risk management."

Innocuous though it may sound, the phrase, pregnant with portentous implications, goes to the heart of Mendelsohn's job at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

As senior vice-president and chief economist, his task is "to help CIBC manage its risk position and to support the officers of the bank in making key decisions."

In this way, Mendelsohn, supported by a group of 16 staff economists, advises senior management and helps enhance profitability.

Judging by the bank's record-breaking profits of recent years, it appears that Mendelsohn and his crew are more than earning their keep.

The bank, he allowed, could function "without us" for a while. But the subtext is clear. In the lyrical words of the rock band America, CIBC needs him like the flowers need the rain.

Mendelsohn, 51, joined the CIBC in 1977 as an economist in its banking and financial analysis sector. A graduate of the City University of New York and McGill, he had previously worked for the C.D. Howe Research Institute and Bell Canada.

At the former, he conducted research on financial markets and institutions and fiscal policy. At the latter, he analyzed domestic and international markets.

In his current capacity as CIBC's chief economist, to which he was appointed in 1992, Mendelsohn is responsible for managing national and international activities of its economics division.

Apart from counselling management on economic trends and policies, he puts out Observations, a monthly journal of forecasts and analysis, along with a number of periodic publications covering everything from the state of financial markets to provincial government finances.

Mendelsohn, whose cramped, book-filled 51st-floor office in Commerce Court West offers a panoramic view of downtown Toronto's skyscrapers and the verdant islands on Lake Ontario, confers regularly with the chair of the bank, the frequency depending upon Canadian and global developments.

"If I have to brief him on something, I pick up the phone," he said. "It could be a couple of times a week to once a month."

As well, he reports to CIBC's board. Last year, before the precipitous collapse of Thailand's baht, he warned board members of a looming crisis in Asia.

Mendelsohn, chair of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce's Economic Policy committee, also dispenses advice to federal and provincial governments, whether in discussions with members of the civil service or before finance committees.

On occasion, he speaks to Finance Minister Paul Martin and his provincial counterparts.

"They want to get a sense of what people in the marketplace are thinking," said Mendelsohn. "We provide advice to governments because better government policy leads to better economic performance for the country as a whole and, as a result, the bank will perform better."

Do they listen?

"In some cases, they take us seriously," he said.

Otherwise, they merely convey that impression, Mendelsohn wryly suggested.

Last but not least, he responds to journalist's questions and customer queries. "If we can help our clients succeed, that will mean more and better business for CIBC. At the end of the day, it is our job to help people make decisions, inside the bank and externally."

Beyond performing these roles, Mendelsohn, who works about 65 hours a week, sits on a special advisory panel of the Ontario Jobs and Investment Board.

The panel is expected to recommend strategies and actions on how Ontario's economy can be more innovative in terms of future growth and competitiveness.

For a man who constantly monitors international developments, information – both raw and processed – is Mendelsohn's daily bread.

Though he runs the risk of being inundated by information overload, Mendelsohn is nothing if not a prodigious reader.

He reads specialized economic journals and devours Canadian, American and British newspapers and magazines from The Globe and Mail and The New York Times to The Financial Post and The Economist.

Not content with only these sources, he scans Reuter's wire service and pores over statistical releases from about 75 countries and data from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

When the need arises, he calls far-flung contacts around the universe for a keener perspective of this or that trend.

And, of course, he seeks the expertise of CIBC's corps of in-house specialists.

Juggling this jumble of data, he sorts out the wheat from the chaff. "You have to be able to bring the pieces together," he explained. "The trick is to identify what's relevant or is likely to be relevant in the future."

Mendelsohn, who also studied political science at the undergraduate level, maintains that a topflight economist must have a broad outlook. He or she must have an understanding of politics, international affairs, psychology, sociology and history. "And an interest in science and technology doesn't hurt either."

Joshua Mendelsohn

Citing two examples, Mendelsohn pointed out that President Bill Clinton's travails in the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal, as well as Japan's reluctance to take appropriate measures to revitalize its economy because of the special nature of its society, could have a bearing on financial developments.

In his opinion, economics is not a science. "It isn't exact. You're ultimately dealing with human beings and, therefore, you don't have a controlled experiment."

Mendelsohn, an acolyte of Joseph Schumpeter and John Maynard Keynes, among others, was originally attracted to the "dismal science" by a Brooklyn College professor who had a talent for enlivening it.

He was born and raised in Tel Aviv, the son of Morris and Lea, a couple who met and married when Israel was still a British mandate.

In the late 1920s, Mendelsohn's grandfather, a Zionist, bought citrus groves around Ra'nana, on the coastal plain, and eventually Morris settled in Palestine to tend to them.

During the mid-1950s, the Mendelsohns left Israel and decamped in New York City, where Morris made a living as a jeweller.

Mendelsohn, whose command of Hebrew remains undimmed, attended a yeshiva in Flatbush. Recalling the seminary's regime of mental gymnastics, he observed, "A lot of good people in economics have studied the Talmud."

Mendelsohn and his wife Eileen, a chartered general accountant, have two children, Matthew, 25, and Lauren, 19. When he is not working, he enjoys puttering around his garden, reading and travelling. The family belongs to Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Mendelsohn, the CIBC's first Jewish chief economist, believes that Canadians should be "reasonably concerned" by the ongoing turmoil in Asia.

"The crisis in Asia has not turned out to be a bump in the road," he said. "It's not resolving itself quickly."

In the past few months, the situation has deteriorated and affected Japan, Canada, Russia and emerging economies in Brazil, Chile and South Africa.

And if China devalues its currency, the problems could worsen, he said.

The "Asian flu" has had a marked effect on Canada because commodity demand and prices have declined. British Columbia has been hardest hit by the fallout, while the Canadian dollar has depreciated to its lowest ever level.

"The sharply weaker dollar poses long-term risks to the Canadian economy. A weak currency is a serious threat not only to the country's economic performance but ultimately to Canadians' standard of living. There are no grounds for complacency."

During the interview, he accused the Bank of Canada of "benign neglect," contending it should raise the interest rates to prop up the dollar.

How much further will the dollar plummet before stability is restored? For once, he was at a loss. "Frankly, I don't know."

Conceivably, it could fall below 60 cents, he observed, adding, "We do need tax cuts over the long term."

Assuming that the American economy remains healthy, he does not expect Canada to plunge into a recession any time soon.

"The worst thing that could happen next year is a slowdown." Mendelsohn forecasts that Canada's growth rate, projected to be in the 3.5 percent range this year, will fall to 2.7 percent in 1999.

Asked if he has any advice for the average investor, Mendelsohn cautioned that he is not an investment counsellor. But with this proviso in mind, he said, "If you're young enough, you can be more invested in the stock and equity market. If you're older, you have to be more conservative."

Deena Kravetsky

Deena Kravetsky, life long partner of Philip Kravetsky, passed away on Saturday, August 22, 1998 at Seven Oaks General Hospital in Winnipeg. The day of her passing was the first day of Rosh Chodesh Elul, 5758. It was the Shabbos of the last week of her 76th year.

Deena was born in Halifax, N.S. on August 26, 1922 (Ulul 2,5682) to Toba and Kopel Zlatin. She was raised and educated in Halifax and after completing high school worked with her parents in their business, Tower Grocery, in Halifax. She also worked as a volunteer at the Jewish Serviceman's canteen. It was while working at the canteen in October, 1944 that she met RCAF Cpt. Philip Kravetsky. They were married on February 21, 1945 and in early 1946, shortly after Phil was discharged from the Air Force, they moved to Winnipeg, Phil's home town.

Deena and Phil shared a belief in community service and soon after moving to Winnipeg, Deena, while raising her family, became involved in volunteer work. In the early years she was an active worker for Pioneer women of Canada (now Na'amat Canada) and served as president of Omna chapter. Throughout the '60's she served on the executive of the Talmud Torah/Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate P.T.A., chairing many of its committees and serving as president from 1965-1967. She was on the Building Committee of the Hebrew Sick Benefit Association during the planning, development and construction of HSBA Gardens, one of the first elderly person's housing projects undertaken by a Jewish Community organization. Deena was a founding member of Chavurat Tefillah/Fellowship of Prayer Synagogue and served for many years as a director, including 3 terms as president of the congregation. She was a member of Mizrachi/Emunah Women of Canada and acted in a variety of capacities within the Sarah Herson-Atid Chapter, as well as in the National organization, including many years as regional vice-president.

Deena's volunteer work extended to less formal and more personal service. She was part of a small group of women who began working toward building a proper women's Mikvah for Winnipeg and was one of the originators of the Winnipeg Mikvah Fund. The work of this small group of women contributed significantly to the establishment of the Chabad Mikvah in 1978. Deena was one of the first and longest serving volunteer attendants for Taharas Hamishpacha; retiring from that service only when she became too ill to carry on. She was a tireless worker in the preparation and staging of countless teas, dinners, fundraisers, and other functions, for the many organizations to which she belonged. She was also the unofficial baker of birthday cakes for the children of Oholei Torah School, the cook baker, and often the server for many special kiddushes at the Lubavitcher Shule, Chabad House, and Chavurat Tefillah; she willingly lent her kitchen skills to the making of special events for many friends and acquaintances. As an avid reader she put her skills to work offering her time as a resource assistant and volunteer tutor at Ralph Brown School, in the late 70's.

Her determination to make Kosher food more readily available in Winnipeg led her to start the Elite Snack Shop in 1968 and run it for several years thereafter. In more recent years she was a volunteer delivery person for the Kosher Meals-On-Wheels program.

Deena was also a member of the Sam Melamed Bikur Cholim Society, in which capacity she was a regular visitor of the sick in hospitals and nursing homes.

She will be remembered by the many students, travellers, and newcomers to the city as someone who welcomed them into her home on Shabbos and Yom Tov.

Besides Phil, her loving and dedicated husband of 53 years, left with the benefit of her life's labours on their behalf, her shining example, and many cherished memories are her children: Michelle and David Hamer of Sharon Mass., Shayna and Dov Patkin of Jerusalem, Bas-Sheva and Eliyohu Simmonds of Winnipeg, Rocky and Barb'ra Kravetsky of Winnipeg, Sandra and David Friedman of Baltimore, Md., Mark and Sharon Kravetsky of Winnipeg, Charles and Ilene Kravetsky of Kitchener, Ont., Ahuva Kratvetsky of Winnipeg, and Jack Kravetsky of Winnipeg; Her grandchildren (and great-grand-children): Deborah, Paige and Yael Hamer; Naomi and Mattis Krishevky (Sara, Faige Liba, Eliezer, Moshe Leib, Frayda, Yisroel and Toibe) Yocheved and Avrohom Sammet (Sora Rivkah, Esther Malka, Aharon, Eliezer, Yitzchok Yehoshua), Miriam and Zvi Valershtein (Sima), Eliezer and Devorah Patkin (Pinchas, Sora Ettel, Malka, and Toibe), Aron Yehuda and Gittel Patkin (Moshe Aryeh and Eliezer), Brocha Malka and Moshe Krishevsky (Sarah Ettel and Avrohom Yitzchak), Yoseph Chaim, Shifra Leah, Simma Toba, Moshe David and Gita Raisa Patkin; Yacov, Chana, Sora Ettel, Eliezer, Avigdor, Avrohom, Zalmon Shimon, Tzvi Hirsch, Yoisef Moishe, Tuba, and Hinda Rivka Simmonds; Ya'ir Aryeh, Nachliel Dror, Chedva Leah, Netanel Moshe, Esther Tirza, Atara Tova, Yehuda Nachum, Nechama Mindle, Chaya Riva, Tehila Keren Friedman; Mayer, Rosie, Tobie, Bayla, Leib, Mordy, and Noah Kravetsky; David Martin, Theodore Cecil and Andrew Michael Kravetsky.

Deena's eldest grand daughter, Naomi Krishevsky, gave birth to a baby girl on Tuesday, August 25, in Jerusalem. Her newest great grand daughter will be named this shabbos (August 29).

Deena was predeceased by her parents and by her brothers, Charlie Zlatin of Montreal, Mike Zlatin, and Morris Zlatin of Halifax. She is survived by her sister, Esther Rabinovitch of Albany, New York and her Sister-in-law Jean Zlatin of Halifax. Also surviving her are many nieces, nephews, and members of her husband's family.

Funeral services and preparations were conducted at Chesed Shel Emes Chapel, Executive director, Rena Boroditsky, attended to the intricacies of burial with special attention and care. Tahara was performed with care and respect by Bonnie Ash, Karen Richter, and Tobi Schulman of the Ladies Chevra Kaddisha. Her husband and children acted as Shomrim and Tehillim were also recited during Shemirah by Rabbi Avrohom Altein, Shmuel Altein, Tzvi-Hirsch Altein, Avigdor Simmonds, and Zalmon Shimon Simmonds.

The funeral service was conducted by Rabbi Avrohom Altein, Director of the Lubavitch Centre and Rabbi of Bais Midrash Ashkenazie; with the participation of Rabbi Yitzchok Charytan, Jewish chaplain of Manitoba; and Deena's son-in-law David Friedman. Pallbearers were her sons-in-law David Hamer, David Friedman, and Eliyohu Simmonds, her grandsons Avigdor Simmonds and Netanel Friedman and her nephew, Warren Cooper. Burial was at Shaarey Zedek Cemetery.

Shiva was sat 54 Meredith Bay, Winnipeg.

Deena was a supporter of many good causes and would be honoured by support for any worthy cause in her memory.

Space: the next frontier for the IDF?

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The air force needs to extend its reach into space, Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu said in an interview with Air Force magazine last week.

"In the future, we will need to correct the historical definition which says that the air force operates in the air, and decide that the air force also operates in space," he said.

Ben-Eliahu said an IAF presence in space would contribute in a variety of areas of combat, and not necessarily against distant enemies.

"You can't link this activity only with actions against far-off enemy nations. Space will also help us in actions in the immediate fronts," Ben-Eliahu said. He said that space allowed a better and further view, since it is not hampered by atmospheric disturbances.

"Planes are often limited, and their operation is a function of the limits of human ability and the territory. Communication with satellites is easier and less restricted.

"The entry of the IAF into space is perceived as entering a separate area from that in which we have operated until now. But a closer look shows the difference is only an extension of the activity we are carrying out in the atmosphere [now]."

Ben-Eliahu added that Israel was able to enter space, and this would contribute to the nation and advance local industries. Israel currently has one satellite, the Ofek-3, and Ben-Eliahu said he is interested in adding another one.

The launch of the Ofek-4, which according to foreign reports, is a spy satellite, failed recently and the Ofek-3 is currently operating beyond its intended life span.

"I hope that in the future we will have more than just one Ofek in the sky. To achieve efficient coverage, the Ofek has to be backed by a series of similar satellites," Ben-Eliahu said.

Beach volleyballers strike paydirt in the sand

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beach volleyball ace Steven Balaban doesn't like to say he and his teammates took their opponents a little too lightly at the Maccabi JCC Youth Games, but once they saw the opposition in action, they knew they could go through the tournament undefeated.

Lucky for the four boys from Toronto they were able to do just that, racking up an impressive 21-0 record en route to a gold medal victory at the recently concluded games in Detroit.

Chicago was the only team that presented the volleyballers from TO with any trouble, but in nine games versus the team from the Windy City, Toronto was tested only once. That came in a semi-final in which Toronto squeaked out a 17-16 nail-biter in Game 2 of the best of three series.

A loss would have evened the series at 1-1 but as it was, Chicago got the opportunity to take revenge as they again lined up against Toronto in the best of five final. Toronto won that series with ease, taking three straight games by scores of 15-6, 15-7 and 15-8.

Other teams participating in the event included Detroit, Ottawa, Rochester and a second contingent from Toronto.

What allowed volleyballers Balaban, Ian Friedman, Daniel Shermer and Aaron Goldberg to dominate the tournament, was their overall talent level, Balaban contended. Other teams relied on a single top player complemented by two or three lesser talents. The Toronto team was more balanced, and featured both himself and Shermer as spikers, Friedman as the set-up man and Goldberg blocking shots.

"We all used each other; we had lots of weapons so the other teams didn't know where we were coming from," he said.

Add to that plenty of preparation - they practiced at Beach Blast, an indoor facility in Toronto, for weeks in advance of the games – and an 11th place showing in the Ontario midget finals (under 15) by Balaban and Shermer, and their victory was certainly no fluke.

Key men on the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) Blues beach volleyball team, Shermer and Balaban met Goldberg and Friedman during tryouts for the youth team three months ago. They clicked pretty quickly.

Balaban, 15, plays indoor volleyball for York Mills Collegiate but was attracted to the beach variety because of the "diving and athleticism" the sport demands.

In recent years, beach volleyball has taken off in popularity and Balaban believes it's due to the ease of playing on a forgiving surface. "It's easier to dive for the ball and move around in the sand," he suggested.

Balaban was enthusiastic about his first Maccabi experience, saying the opening ceremonies in the Palace of Auburn Hills, home of the Detroit Pistons, was especially memorable. Being part of a group of 3,000 athletes from Canada, the United States, Mexico, Israel and Britain marching into the stadium was a "great, unbelievable" feeling, he said.

Pan Am Maccabi Games on tap

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may be three years before the next Maccabiah Games in Israel, but that doesn't mean the Maccabi machinery has been left on 'idle'.

Far from it. In fact, Maccabi Canada offialdom has already begun to plan the next big event in their four-year calendar: the 1999 Maccabi Pan American Games in Mexico City.

Canada will send only about 100 athletes to Mexico, far less than the 250 who went to Israel in 1997 but double the contingent sent to Argentina for the Pan Ams in 1996.

Canada will join other Western Hemisphere countries sending teams, including the United States, Colombia, Argentina, Venezuela and Brazil as well as contingents from Israel, Australia and Britain. Altogether, 20 countries will be represented at the games.

The Canadian team will consist of men, women, junior boys and girls and masters athletes. Like the other participants, Canada is making a deliberate effort to bolster its female representation at the Mexico City games. In the past, the Canadian team has been under-represented when it came to female participation, said Allen Gerskup, vice-chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

"Traditionally, we haven't had a lot of girls. That's our problem. One sport I'd like to take is girls' basketball, but they're not offering it," he said.

(Canada was one of only a handful of countries to field a female basketball team at last summer's games in Israel, the first time the Maccabiah Games including women's basketball.)

Instead, Gerskup is hoping to find enough female athletes to fill a junior girls softball team while adding female contingents to the bowling, tennis, swimming, gymnastics and golf teams.

Canadians are also expected to compete in: men's softball, junior boys baseball, soccer (the full field, outdoor variety), rugby, masters basketball and 10-pin bowling.

Other sports on offer in Mexico city include: track and field, squash, volleyball (men and women), waterpolo, judo and karate. Junior competition is limited to athletes between 14 and 17 years of age while masters events are dedicated to seasoned athletes 35 and up.

Athletes will be expected to ante-up $3,000 a piece for the unsubsidized games, Gerskup said.

For more information, Gerskup can be reached at 630-7799.

The Inside Back

One cheer for the Swiss

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

No sooner was the ink dry on Swiss banks' accepted offer of $1.25 billion (US) to settle all Holocaust-era claims, than Jewish organizations scrambled to figure out how to disburse the money. There was talk of committees, toll-free telephone numbers and more committees. Maybe Sergio Karas, the Toronto lawyer who represents the 25 Canadian claimants, was right when he said that the Swiss had made a deft move: by coughing up a relatively paltry sum, they shifted this from a Swiss problem to a Jewish problem.

Maybe the banks did play it smart. They low-balled an initial offer to settle out of court at $600 million. The World Jewish Congress wanted twice that. Fine, said the banking gnomes of Zurich and Bern, and magnanimously signed over what any person, working stiff or not, would regard as a mountain of cash.

But consider: for just one percent of their combined assets in the United States alone – and without so much as denting their triple-A Moody's ratings – the Union Bank of Switzerland and Credit Suisse made the whole problem go away, and dumped it straight into the laps of Jewish bureaucrats in New York.

It is thus now up to Jewish groups (Canadian Jewish Congress in this country) to address the unseemly task of who gets what.

And in no way should this settlement be construed as a signal of culpability on the part of the Swiss government. Last week, the Swiss National Bank announced it would not be contributing a single franc to the fund, saying that while it "regrets the dark side of its conduct" during the war, it had already met its obligations under international law.

And all along, the super-defensive Swiss insisted on using the word compensation to describe the settlement. One rumor had it that during the tough negotiations, a lawyer representing the banks told his American counterparts, "Use the word 'restitution,' and the deal is off."

The Swiss have had an understandably difficult time in trying to keep the tarnish off their reputation, fending off charges, not just of money-laundering, but of outright collaboration with the Nazis to safeguard their beloved "neutrality." That has become doubtless harder with the publication about a year ago of Switzerland: A War-time Island – Aid and Rescue Activities, 1939-1946 by Swiss-born Jewish activist Heini Bornstein, now a kibbutznik in Israel.

The book isn't about banking or gold. It's about compassion, and it's not a pretty picture. According to Bornstein, who organized secret rescue efforts in Switzerland during the war, the Swiss government had a policy on only one group of refugees. Guess which.

From 1933 to 1939, the Swiss took in 8,000 Jews and turned away 40,000. During the war itself, the government admitted 20,000 and turned over tens of thousands of Jews to the SS. In all, Jews accounted for less than 10 percent of all refugees Bern accepted during the Nazi era.

To compound its dismal record (Canada's was worse, it should be stated), the government made Switzerland's 18,000-member Jewish community financially responsible for Jewish refugees, despite the fact that it picked up the tab for all other refugees. Anyone who wasn't sponsored was shipped off to a work camp in the Swiss countryside.

And did you know this? It was Switzerland's idea, Bornstein charges, to stamp the passports of German Jews with a "J" and to include on them the mocking Jewish names "Israel" for men and "Sarah" for women, a proposal the Nazis snapped up.

Now, instead of contrition, rectified school curricula and an honest commitment to the truth, the Swiss have dismissed the ugliest episode in their history with a cheque.

Like many others, I once clung to a picture of Switzerland as a pristine, even-handed place that wisely stays out of grubby conflicts; and sticks to making watches and money. Another quaint image bites the dust.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am writing concerning my mother who is having a difficult time coping with her declining eyesight. She is 95 years old and has medical problems. My mother has severe angina, suffers with frequent transient ischemic attacks and is prone to bleeding ulcers. She has been in and out of hospital with congestive heart failure several times over the past year and a half.

My mother also has a hearing problem. She has difficulty walking and must use a walker. She has cataracts in both eyes, and her ophthalmologist told her that due to her severe cardiac condition and advanced age, surgical removal of cataracts is not an option.

My mother appears to be very depressed and lacks motivation. She is socially isolated and has no interest in getting involved with activities. She frequently falls asleep in her chair during the day. She, of course, denies this. As a result, she has difficulty sleeping at night. How can I help her?

LS

Dear LS,

Your mother would benefit greatly from a geriatric assessment to determine the cause of her lack of interest. I would suggest that you ask her physician to make a referral to the geriatric clinic at the hospital she frequents.

It would appear that her visual impairment may be linked to her lack of interest and motivation. A second opinion for feasibility of cataract surgery should be requested. Should surgery not be an option, then a low vision clinic at the hospital or your local association for the blind could be explored. Some suggestions for visual aids might help your mother better adapt to her visual limitations.

To alleviate her isolation and provide stimulation, you may want to explore various agencies in your community and request a volunteer friendly visitor.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal

Charity fundraiser pays homage to Diana

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Thousands of admirers of Princess Diana are making the pilgrimage to the Dresses for Humanity exhibit to pay homage to the much beloved princess.

The exhibit, which features 20 opulent dresses – cocktail dresses and evening gowns – worn by Diana at various state, charity and private functions, is being held at the Thomson Gallery at the Bay's flagship store at Queen and Yonge Streets until Oct. 4.

The exhibit, operating under the auspices of the People's Princess Charitable Foundation, will be on a two-year-long world tour to raise funds for charities associated with causes supported by the late princess, among them cancer, AIDS and children's health.

Local charities benefitting from the proceeds of the Bay exhibit, the only Canadian stop on the tour, include Casey House Hospice, Corrine Boyer Fund for Ovarian Cancer Treatment and Research, and Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital.

On the cover:
Mondi's smooth almond green and deep rich moor green in a refined elegant feminine cut

Worn on a trip to India.

The "Travolta" gown.

The dresses in the exhibit are part of the collection of 79 dresses that were auctioned for charity– $5.6 million (US) was raised – at Christie's in New York City in June 1997, just two months before Diana died in a car crash.

Each dress fetched between $19,000 and $222,500, the latter sum was for the dark blue velvet dress worn when Diana danced with John Travolta at a White House dinner in 1985.

The purchaser of this famous "Travolta" gown was Maureen Rorech, a Tampa businesswoman who now heads the People's Princess Charitable Foundation. She successfully bid on 13 of the dresses, later purchasing a 14th. Her collection became the basis of the travelling evening dress exhibit.

The exhibition clearly confirms that Diana was every stitch a royal, with a wardrobe definitely fit for a princess. All but one of the 20 dresses were made specifically for her in British couture houses, and each one was executed with exquisite detailing.

For example, it took three women three weeks to complete the beading on a halter-neck, embroidered, champagne silk evening gown worn by the princess in 1997 on her first public appearance after her divorce from Prince Charles.

This gown, like most of the dresses in the exhibit, was designed by Catherine Walker, the princess' favorite designer.

One of the most impressive dresses by Walker was a pink, wild silk gown with a gathered skirt worn on a 1992 tour of India. The strapless bodice, which was close-fitting to the hips, was embroidered with pink and white flowers to emulate the centuries-old Mughal motifs. It was layered with green sequins, gold and glass beads and gold braiding, and was paired with a bolero jacket with the same beading and embroidery on the bodice, and a subtle contrasting beaded border along the neckline.

Walker also designed the two beaded silk cocktail dresses – simple shift style – which were worn by Diana at the galas for her dress auction in 1997. One can see that many of the dresses worn by Diana in the '90s were more chic and tailored than the gowns she favored in the earlier years of her public life.

According to exhibition organizers, Diana was a perfect U.K. size 8 – she had broad shoulders, a full bustline and narrow hips – and so the dresses were designed to accentuate her natural physical assets.

The blue, silk velvet "Travolta" dress, the most famous in the collection, was designed by Victor Edelstein, who was inspired by an Edwardian dinner dress. The wide V-neck bodice, with off-the-shoulder straps, was intricately draped to the hips over a gently gathered skirt with a slight bustle. Rorech will be donating this dress to the Smithsonian Institute in Washington D.C. She will offer the other 13 dresses to Diana's children, Prince William and Prince Harry, after the tour.

Rorech said she hopes to raise $100 million (US) from the exhibition.

WARMTH FOR WOMEN CAMPAIGN

Over the last two years over 1,200 women have felt a little warmer during the cold winter months, thanks to J. Michaels' Warmth For Women coat trade-in event, a charitable campaign that helps provide warm clothing for women who use the services provided by women's shelters across Canada.

Customers are invited to bring into any J.Michaels store any used winter coat, (in good condition) and J.Michaels will offer them a rebate of between $50-$100 off the purchase of any new coat or topper in the store. The old coats will be distributed to women's shelters in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

The perils of dressing kids

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to making a fashion statement, size matters – at least for my sons it does, and the bigger and sloppier the clothing, the better.

They can swim in their shorts and T-shirts and they'll only wear jeans that reach the ground and trail dirt.

Thank goodness Leigh, 11, and Evan, 8, are not yet knowledgeable about name brands (except for shoes – they've got to have Nikes), so I can get away with Brand X clothes...for now. As for my youngest son, it's strictly hand-me-downs. At six, Matthew is pretty oblivious to fashion.

So far I don't have to break the bank to outfit my kids for school. But many parents aren't so lucky, particularly parents of teen and pre-teen girls. For this group, shopping for school clothes is very serious business.

"Everything has to be just right," says Sarah Laiken of Thornhill, mother of Rosalyn, 17, and Rebecca, 13. "I bought all the right clothes for camp so hopefully they won't want a lot of new things, but I probably won't get that lucky. It had to be certain clothes for camp.

"It had to be the right jeans — flared or bell bottom. I had to go to the right jean store.

"Rebecca likes all the brand names. We saw a Nike cap. She had to have that hat. I can't tell you how many caps I have in the house. Why can't they wear those? It has to be Nike."

Another Thornhill mother, Bev Bergman, says her youngest daughter, Randi, 13, loves new clothes. "She likes the little cropped tops. I won't let her wear them. She likes tight-fitting and we compromise between tight and baggy. Her taste is what's in the magazines. But it's not appropriate for her lifestyle. She can't wear those kinds of things to Associated."

Carolyn Libman, a mother of three who also resides in Thornhill, says she gets away pretty cheaply with her seven-year-old son Robby. "I just take out a bag of hand-me-downs from my nephews," she says. But she stresses that it's a completely different story with daughters Jenny, 13, and Sarah 11.

Getting ready for school entails making the mandatory rounds of Thornhill malls to check out the different clothing stores, Libman explains. The girls also hold plenty of consultations with friends on what's cool before any serious purchases are made.

Jenny, a Grade 8 student, is pretty clear about what clothes she wants – blue jeans – flared or bell bottoms are absolutely compulsory. The jeans fit snug on the top, but hang loose on the legs. Long-sleeved solid-colored T-shirts falling just below the waist are worn with jeans.

Hot logos include Old Navy, Nike and Adidas, she adds. "People also like stuff with cartoon characters."

Running shoes made by Nike or Reebok are another fashion necessity, she says. She also owns a pair of platform shoes – "black, not too high" – for special occasions. She says she rarely wears skirts, but for shul she'll be wearing a straight black skirt above the knee paired with a plain button-down shirt.

Younger sister Sarah says she chooses her clothing based on what "my friends say is in and what I like." Flared and bell bottom jeans, medium length T-shirts in solid colors and name brand running shoes will anchor her wardrobe.

She also favors Manager flared overalls – they're on her wish list – as well as plaid shirts worn over T-shirts and a corduroy version of the popular Canadian Olympic team hat. Hospital pants with messages inscribed on the seat are also hot items.

Accessory items on the list reflect the style of her 11-year old peers which Jenny says no self-respecting 13-year-old would consider wearing, among them: knapsacks in the shape of cartoon characters; friendship necklaces; jelly bracelets; plastic bangles with sparkles in bright colors; and thin silver guitar string bracelets.

"You have to wear six or seven bracelets at a time," Sarah explains.

Items at the makeup counter in vogue for preteens include hair mascara, body glitter for the eyelids, nail polish in pastel shades of blue, and clear mascara, she adds.

Across town in Riverdale, an urban neighborhood in Toronto's east end, Amanda Wyman, Becca Young and Meredith Kinoshita, all 13, hold court on what's cool for fall.

Wyman says she chooses a mix of vintage and new clothes. She says she's looking for loose-fitting comfortable jeans – corduroy or chino-style. The girls decide that cargo pants – wide pants with many pockets – bell-bottom jeans and flared sweat pant are definitely in vogue.

Tank and cropped tops are popular, but not necessarily welcomed garments in their schools, Wyman notes. She says she'll opt for T-shirts that go below the waist.

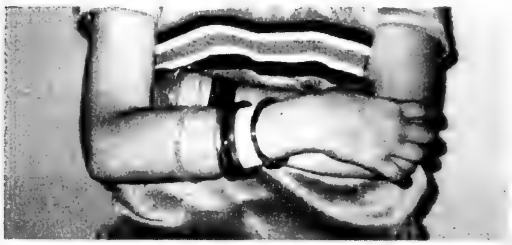
Zippered sweaters and sweatshirts with hoods are also big this year, she says. "I love hoods."

The butterfly motif embroidered on jeans, and as accessories in the hair, are appealing, but Wyman laments that they're becoming too common-place.

"Unfortunately you see too much of it." Small backpacks as purses are out of fashion, she notes. "I have one but I don't wear it any more. A shoulder bag looks a lot classier."

Wyman says she likes to wear long skirts down to the ankle. "They're really comfortable and I think they look good."

Other items considered cool by the three teens: down vests, chunky shoes with big heels, and running shoes. Comfort is more important than name-brand running shoes, but for some of their peers it's really important, the three say. "You can tell which people like brand names," says Wyman.



Sarah likes to wear six or seven bracelets at a time.

A new look for popular men's clothier

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Shops and cafes have come and gone on the trendy Danforth strip known as Greek Town, but Korry's Clothiers has been a familiar landmark in this east end neighborhood for over three decades.

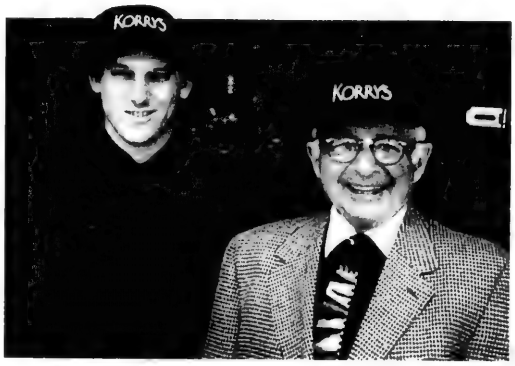
Anybody visiting Korry's this summer may have noticed the storefront draped in drop cloths while the store underwent a facelift. President Saul Korman is very excited about unveiling the store's new glass and stone exterior this month. "We're getting ready for the new millennium," he says.

"I always said renovate, motivate or evaporate. You've got to keep a business up to date — You can't be stale. You've got to motivate yourself, your staff, everybody, otherwise you'll evaporate or disappear. Your competition will eat you up alive."

He says Korry's needed to get a new look to fit in with the stylishness of the Danforth neighborhood, which has grown increasingly fashionable since the 1980s. Korman predicts the area will soon become the trendiest shopping district in Toronto and wants Korry's, one of the city's best-known men's clothiers, "to look the best on the street."

Korman stresses that while Korry's will get a new look, the basic philosophy of the store – carrying a mix of private and designer labels – will be the same.

"We cater to people of all budgets. They can start with our private in-house label – it's good value – and as their income grows, they can move to designer suits by Hugo Boss, Arnold Brant and Canali. As their budget grows, we grow with them."



Saul Korman (right) with son Michael.

He says advertising draws people from all over the city. "Once they come in, they all come back. We spend a lot of money on advertising."

Indeed, Korman's gravelly voice on advertising spots on Toronto radio stations have made him something of a household name and a much-appreciated member of the local business community. He advertises his store by promoting the whole neighborhood, he says. "The Greek community has been very supportive of Korry's because we have supported the community.

"We're on the radio on Friday inviting people to come to the Danforth. It's very colorful and trendy with its sidewalk cafes. People consider me the mayor of Danforth. The Orthodox Jewish congregation there calls me their mentor. I support all the Jewish groups in the area and other communities as well."

He also promotes the store by generating excitement about men's fashion – holding fashion shows, having parties and catering to local celebrities, he says. "There's always exciting things going on in the store. They might see a radio announcer, or Elvis Stojko. When [Stojko] needed a tuxedo for the Miss Universe Pageant – he was a judge – he came to us."

He says last year he held three "great events" at the store: a showing of the Hugo Boss line, complete with beer from Germany; a giveaway of a free trip to Italy with "no obligation to buy" during Italian month; and a recent contest to win a $10,000 trip to Greece compliments of Cronos Travel on the Danforth.

Korry's, which has always been on the Danforth, started out as a family business in 1952, a tradition that's continued into the1990s. Korman and his late father Nathan set up the original business much further east at 1478 Danforth Ave., moving further west to 613 before settling into its present address at 569 Danforth 27 years ago.

Korman's oldest son Michael has been working in the business for the last 12 years and his daughter Jodi also works there full time.

Korman says one of the keys to the success of the business has been service. There are tailors on the premises for alterations, and sales associates are skilled wardrobe consultants.

He adds that a letter goes out to all customers to check if they're satisfied with the merchandise and he attends to complaints himself.

He says he personally answers all fashion questions to anyone who calls and there's no obligation to buy. "We get about 20 calls a week. People call to get advice about what to wear for an occasion."

So what does this menswear guru forecast for fall? "Fall is exciting," he says, noting that for suits there's a lot of grey with green tones and a new shade of dark blue. Shirts in new darker shades – new blues, golds and greens – are important

Do we really, really need another black pantsuit?

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to the CJN

Each year the apparel industry spends mega dollars advertising their seasonal trends in women's magazines, hoping to reach that tenuous chord of insecurity that nudges us into buying the latest version of the classic black pantsuit.

But do we really need another?

The jacket each year is just a little longer, a tad shorter, the pants are a few inches wider, or slightly more tapered – just enough if we compare carefully, to relegate last Fall's acquisition to the "B" section of the closet.

Who decides what looks good on us? Is it the designers at Versace, Armani and Donna Karan? Or should we have a quick consultation with our best friend and foe – the full-length mirror.

Keeping an open mind to trying something new in fashion is refreshing, although we all instinctively know what we like, and where the boundaries of our comfort zone lie.

Why would you want to look like a copy of someone else? Relying on your own tastes and preferences creates the essence of your individuality.

Having the confidence to carry it off shows a certain élan that makes us all unique.

Of course women want to look current, but that shouldn't mean being duped into buying one more of anything.

Fashion time warp:

The more things change, the more they stay the same

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

It's sometimes comforting to know that things don't change. When we were at that often awkward age of 12 to 20, when we were far from grown up but thought we were, we felt that the way we dressed made us unique, distinct individuals, head and shoulders above the rest.

But when I look back at my old pictures from high school in the '70s, I'm in my bell-bottom jeans, clogs and short sweaters, and I can't help but notice that I look exactly the same as all my friends in every shot.

This summer, I spent two weeks in the Laurentian town of Huberdeau, on the sprawling grounds of the Harry Bronfman Y Country Camp. The camp was home to 450 campers and close to 300 staff, and I could see quite clearly that, as if in a time warp, many of today's fashions for teens are much the same as they were in my day.

I spoke to some of the kids about their individual fashion sense.

Twelve-year-old Dahlia loves bell bottoms and tight tops, but she is quick to point out that her belly button should not show. She keeps up with the latest styles by consulting fashion and teen magazines such as Seventeen and by looking to her friends for fashion hints.

But the clunky, chunky running shoes that are all the rage are not for Dahlia. "I don't like the look of those shoes, and besides, you can't run in those high heels!"

A student at Jewish People's School, Dahlia wears a uniform all week and looks forward to dressing down for the weekend.

While she tries to keep up with today's fashion, Dahlia stresses that comfort is the utmost priority in her fashion choices. "For me to wear something," says Dahlia, "it must feel comfortable. If I am going to wear something it must fit right too."

While Dahlia sometimes goes to the malls with her friends, she still enjoys shopping with her mother, who she feels she can trust for advice as to the most appropriate look and fit. Shoe shopping seems most successful with her Dad in tow, she says, and to date shopping excursions are fun with minimum stress attached.

Eighteen-year-old Kelly says she is a "sweater person." Her personal uniform is geared to comfort at all costs. While she might sometimes go for a skimpy top and tight jeans, her daily outfit consists of sweatpants and a sweatshirt.

Today's sweats have evolved far away from the gym, as old workout clothes and have become acceptable for school and social outings. Kelly says she prefers bright colors and stays away from most florals and prints.

Kelly also prefers flatter more practical running shoes but confesses to owning a large assortment of shoes ranging from flats to Spice Girl platforms with matching purses. "Shoes and purses have to match," Kelly stresses.

One change in fashion from the '70s is the tendency to have multiple ear piercings and body piercing. Kelly sports five holes in her ears, three on one side and two on the other, but she is quick to point out that any body piercing is out of the question for her.

Tattoos have also seen a revival among teenagers but Kelly says she realizes that while extra piercing can always close, tattoos are permanent and are not something she would consider having.

Elliott, 15, arrived at the camp in standard issue baggy cargo pants with huge pockets all over, an extra-large T-shirt hanging on a size small frame, and boxers peeking out above the belt that just barely held his pants up over his hips. This rapper or hip-hop look is still wildly popular with many teens.

As for sweats, Elliott says, "Sweats are for sleeping!"

While he tries hard to keep up with fashion trends, he says he is still greatly influenced by his parents and cannot be too outlandish in his choices.

Long, flowing skirts in flowered prints with plain colored T-shirts are the first fashion choices for 13-year-old Melanie. This year has seen a shift from the mini skirt to feminine ankle-length skirts that can be worn with high heels or flats, or even a favorite pair of running shoes.

I discovered that teens are fashion savvy and very aware consumers who have learned at an early age to become discriminating consumers.

Liposuction is not a cure for cellulite

By CAROL WISE
Special to the CJN

Standing naked in front of the mirror can be very enlightening. There are few people that don't have a little fat they would like to remove.

Liposuction, says Dr. Michael Bederman, cosmetic surgeon at the Centre for Cosmetic Surgery, began as a technique in the early '80s designed to remove fat mainly from the saddle-bag area.

From being considered an uncommon procedure, it has become the leading cosmetic procedure in North America. This is in large part, due to two new and exciting advances that have occurred.

Liposuction is a procedure in which fat is extracted through a small (six millimetre) incision with a flute-like instrument called a canula, and a vacuum pump.

In the early days, this was associated with a significant loss of blood, and irregularity of the skin, which limited the usefulness of the procedure. This body-contouring technique has been refined through the use of tumescent liposuction and the use of ultrasound.

What is tumescent liposuction? Dr. Bederman explains, it is a method whereby fluid containing saline, dilute amounts of local anesthetic and a blood vessel constrictor are injected into the fat prior to suction. This emulsifies the fat, making it easier to be suctioned, practically eliminating the blood loss and the frightening possibility of a blood transfusion.

It also reduces the amount of post-operative bruising and pain. This incredible system was introduced in the early '90s. It has made liposuction much safer, and clearly provides better contouring and overall better results.

Now, ultrasound is the piece de resistance. When the fat is exposed to the ultrasonic sound waves of the mentor canula, the fat cells literally explode without any blood loss whatsoever. This process breaks down fat, particularly in hard-to-get-at areas like the upper abdomen in men where there is a lot of fibrous tissue, or in the flanks or love handles where the fat is difficult to remove.

This is a completely bloodless procedure that plainly enhances the overall liposuction process.

The procedure begins with the injection of the tumescent fluid. Then, the ultrasonic wand is inserted under the skin and carefully passed through the areas of excess fat. Suction is then used to remove this ultrasonically exploded fat and other areas of fat deposit.

There is some evidence that the ultrasound causes the skin to shrink and redrape better, giving an overall more pleasing appearance.

Liposuction does not cure cellulite and is not designed for weight reduction. However, people do lose a few pounds, and some women, if they have had significant fat beforehand, will go down a couple of dress sizes.

Bederman always informs patients that liposuction does not tighten muscles or skin. It simply removes fat, therefore improvement will depend on the amount of fat being extracted. He has performed over 5,000 liposuction procedures, and recently won Now Magazine's 1997 Readers Poll award for best plastic surgeon.

New look for Korry's

this year. He also adds that "the three button suit is here to stay."

For someone just starting to build a wardrobe, Korman recommends starting with the basics. "Everyone should start off with a dark suit in a 12-month-a-year fabric. It should be the best suit they can afford because the cost per wearing may sometimes be cheaper in the long run in a better quality suit."

As for shirts, he suggests two'out of every three be white.

Korman says the trend in tie-sizes is to middle width, and there are two options in patterns – bold large patterns, or smaller patterns for the more conservative.

"I prefer the more flamboyant," Korman says. "The tie is a way to make a statement."

BEAUTY SHOP

BY CAROL WISE

Colors this fall are romantic and alluring. Palettes are adorned with a medley of sultry hues. Colors merge together magically, creating the true mystery of every woman.

A beautiful oil painting begins with a clean, smooth canvas. Be sure to get a professional facial, or apply an at-home facial scrub and purifying mask to combat the lack of humidity in the air. Use a suitable moisturizing face and eye cream twice daily, and don't forget about your body and hands.

Keep healthy and fit with regular exercise and a healthy diet. Just because you are wearing more clothing doesn't mean it's doughnut time. Be careful, spring will soon be just around the corner.

Carol's Tips

Skin Care: Cold, dry air causes our skin to become dry and tight. Exfoliate regularly and use lots of yummy moisturizers on your whole body. Christian Dior's hand cream (Dior Main) and body cream (Regulateur Peaux Seches) both wrap your cells in a voluptuous protective cocoon while moisturizing and nourishing simultaneously – goodbye snake skin, hello softness.

And don't miss Capture Essentiel Yeux, Dior's futuristic anti-aging formula specifically designed for beautifying the eyes.

Chanel introduces three spectacular eye creams. Whether your problem is crows' feet, dehydration, and/or dark circles and puffiness, there is a treat in store for you.

Estee Lauder releases landmark research findings on skin damage and aging. The results of a milestone clinical study in France prove that blended anti-oxidants and vitamins, when applied to the skin, significantly reduce environmentally triggered damage and promote self-repair of damage already done – the name is simply Day Wear.

L'Oreal Plenitude widens its Futur.e family and offers two new ways to moisturize and improve clarity – Futur.e oil-free and Futur.e SPF. Both these luxurious products contain vitamin E to help neutralize free radicals and help protect the skin from weakening.

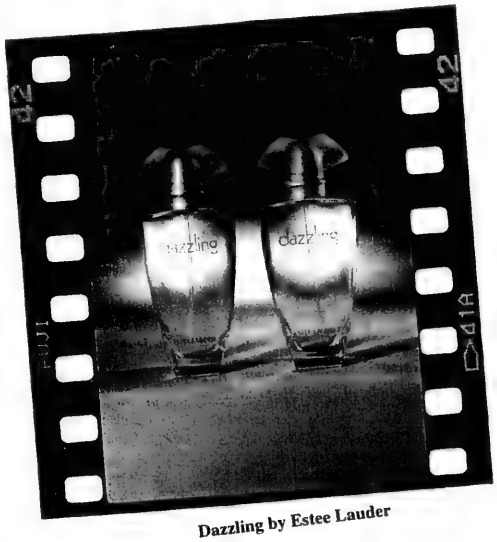
Foundation: an absolute must at this time of the year. Choose a color close to your natural skin tone and apply sparingly. There is no need for a thick cakey look.

Diorlight foundation is like wearing makeup without looking made up. It's lightweight, user-friendly, and never flaunts its presence.

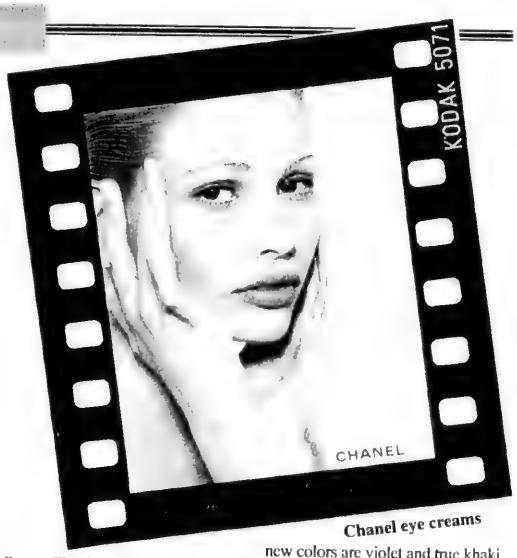
Duoperfection from Biotherm is powder and foundation all in one, and offers perfection in a very pretty case.

Also from Biotherm is Aqua-Teint-Mat, a fluid, long-lasting foundation that contains more than 40 percent water, creating a freshness that is unprecedented for a foundation. This formula helps prevent the appearance of shine throughout the day.

Revlon's Even Out Makeup helps neutralize imperfections, leaving the skin polished, silky and natural looking. Cover any dark circles or blemishes with Derma Blend, sold in a variety of colors at all Bay locations.



Dazzling by Estee Lauder



Chanel eye creams

Sweet Cheeks: This season, cheeks will be colored with extra delicious colors and textures.

Lancome's Blush Duo consists of two transparent cases that stack together or can be carried individually. There are three choices of colors with two incredible textures: a matte to be applied as a classic blush and a glossy texture for an ultra-trendy effect.

For the very daring apply Lancome's micro-sparkles high on the cheekbone – great fun!

Blushwear from Clinique is an elegant cream-to-powder formula that's silky to touch and transfer resistant. Fall shades include shy blush and natural blush.

Simply exquisite is Chanel's powder blush in "flame" – great for all skin tones. For extra dazzle, try a quick stroke of Minute Makeup Goldstick from Estee Lauder.

Eyes: Sultry and sexy for those cozy fireplace nights. Get the ultimate effect with Stay the Day Eye Shadow from Clinique. Hot new shades are olive gold and naughty plum. An ultra-thin application of Quickliner For Eyes, also from Clinique, subtly adds detail. Great new colors are violet and true khaki.

Les 4 Ombres/ Eye Color Collection from Chanel lives up to its name – Mystères – in every way.

Christian Dior treats us with three new compacts that include five sensuous harmonies of color – your own artist's palette – terrific for travel.

Lips: Lips shine, sparkle and are simply kissable. Try Lancome's Lip Brio to lacquer all shades and give them brilliance. For a sheer effect opt for Clinique's Chubby Stick in nude ice, blackberry and angel kiss.

Chanel's Lip Blush redefines translucence with its delicate powder creme formula. One color, "bizarre," is a fascinating red-brown that goes from an intense shade when concentrated to a transparent shade when blotted. It's easy to apply, long-lasting and feels marvelous. Use their lip definer, "amber," for definition.

Impress your friends with Rouge Diorific, Dior's fabulous lipstick encased in glittering gold. It's like jewelry. Favorite colors this season are violet twist and big bang brown. Top up with Diorific Plastic Shine

Top designers receive grants

The Canadian fashion industry received a substantial financial boost last month as 25 designers were awarded a total of $700,000 in grants announced by the Matinée Fashion Foundation.

The list of recipients – the largest number designated in a single year since the foundation was established six years ago – includes eight Ontario designers, seven from Quebec, and 10 conducting business in Western Canada.

The foundation was founded in 1992, and has provided nearly $4 million in financial assistance to designers of men's and women's apparel who submit successful applications for career development projects.

The scope of areas considered for funding touch on virtually every aspect of the Canadian fashion industry: product and market development, production, human resources, and skill enhancement.

The Ontario grant recipients are, alphabetically, Brian Bailey (Galahad & Ashbourne), Dominic Bellissimo (International Trademarks Apparel), Wayne Clark, David Dixon, Romona Keveza (Gordon Dress), Ross Mayer, Justina McCaffrey (Justina McCaffrey Haute Couture, and Franco Mirabelli (Toronto).

In Quebec, grants were awarded to Jean Airoldi, Evik Asatoorian (Rudsak), Christian Chenail (Muse), Marcel Dénommé & Louise Vincent (Dénommé Vincent Pret-a-Porter Masculin Inc., Dimitri Hatzepetros (Ike & Dean), Chantal Levesque (Shan), and Nadya Toto (Pret-a-Porter Nadya Toto).

In Western Canada, 1998-99 grant recipients are RozeMerie Cuevas (Jacqueline Conoir Designs, Jill Davis Godfrey & Sylvie Vincent (Frou-Frou Designs), Ron Escher & Normand Brouillette (Ron et Normand), Yumi Eto (E.T.O. Clothes), Yoel Farzan (Poorboy Clothing Company), Patricia Fieldwalker (Arabesque Design Ltd.), Ron Leal (T.A.G./The Apparel Group Ltd.), Christine Morton (Christine & Company), Deborah Tissington (Neto Enterprises), and Feizal Virani (House of Virani Inc.).

"The Marinée Fashion Foundation responds to the needs of the Canadian fashion industry by providing funds to talented designers who require financial assistance to achieve a higher level of recognition and success," said Chris de Minckwitz, president of the foundation.

"The concept is a simple one. Basically, applicants are asked to identify what their needs are, and how it will help them achieve their business objectives and personal goals."

for a long-lasting effect. Polish your nails with colors to match – oh, so fem.

Try L'Oreal's two-sided white and black lipstick to lighten or darken any shade. Revlon's dual-ended pencil provides long-wearing creamy color on one end and vitamin enriched tinted lip color on the other – fabulous for touch-ups.

For a bold pout, paint your lips with Estee Lauder's Bronzino True Lipstick and outline with their new liner called Chocolate.

Nails: Medium length, square and gently curved at the corners, says nail technician Michelle Hanauer (The Heart of Nails). From deep burgundy to soft skin tones, the choice is yours.

A minor miracle of technology called Zapping comes to you courtesy of Lancome. It is a film of polish that peels off and nails are ready for a new color. Yes that's right, say goodbye to nail polish remover forever.

Don't miss Chanel's Brun Sortilege and Rouge Peche, the basics of every woman's collection.

Estee Lauder's fingertips rock with colors like yellow diamonds and antique amethyst; just open up the jewelry box and select the jewel you fancy.

Hair: This season, hair is sleek, straight and very shiny. Silver is the hottest, most current shade. Yes, silver, says hair designer Daniel Fiorio of Salon Daniel.

"It is not grey, it is the color of metal," he says – intrigue at its best.

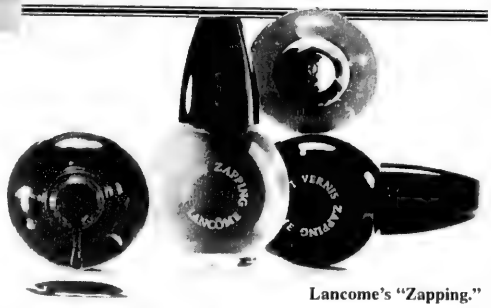
L'Oreal has created Tec Ni Art, a new range of hairstyling products that intermingles art, technology and creativity. For the ultimate in gloss, fix and lift, these products are second to none.

Fragrance: Rich and creamy travel bars of soap pleasure your skin with the alluring scent of Allure from Chanel. Complete with a matching transparent soap box, these little gems are truly luxury on the road.

Chanel, this season, has also developed Eau De Parfume Spray in the now legendary N. 5 bottle. This abstract floral scent dating back to 1921 always satisfies women's most secret desires.

The fragrance Red from Lancome stirs the air with the surprise of a sharp, sudden storm. A sensual red, hot harmony that delights all the senses.

Estee Lauder's Dazzling Gold is enflamed by a woman's intimacy and warmth, while Dazzling Silver is effervescent and radiantly romantic.



Lancome's "Zapping."

Treat your special guy with Lanvin L'Homme. This scent is elegant and discreet – like the crispness of a clean white shirt.

Will money be the last word?

Focus on Holocaust settlements questioned

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Will money be the last word on the Holocaust?

In the wake of the recent financial settlement with the Swiss banks, some Holocaust scholars and survivors are voicing concerns that the publicity surrounding the monetary settlements may overshadow the memory and lessons of the Nazi genocide against the Jewish people.

"I'm not sure how much it will be worth if the result is going to be a simple sound bite – 'Jews died because of their money,'" Abraham Foxman, a survivor who is the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said in an interview after the settlement was announced.

Switzerland's two largest commercial banks agreed, after months of negotiations with attorneys and Jewish groups representing survivors, to pay $1.25 billion (US) over a three-year period to settle all Holocaust-era claims against Swiss interests, except insurance firms.

On the morning after the settlement was reached, most media headlines declared, in effect: "Jews hail money settlement."

The settlement is the first in what is now expected to be large monetary settlements with European companies and governments regarding claims on bank accounts, unpaid insurance polices and stolen artworks.

"The longer this dragged on, the more the press got into it. It became a circus relating to Jews and their money, Jews and their bank accounts, Jews and their gold, Jews and their Stradivariuses, Jews and their Picassos," said Foxman.

Many in the Jewish community who work to preserve the memory of the Holocaust now fear that in some way, the tragic legacy of European Jewry will be twisted by squabbles over looted assets.

Air crash mobilizes Halifax Jews

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The small Halifax Jewish community is doing whatever possible to ease the anguish of families who lost relatives and friends in the crash of Swissair Flight 111 off Peggy's Cove last week.

The community was busy over the Labor Day weekend, organizing guest housing for Shabbat and kosher meals, and making arrangements for a chevrah kadishah.

Three rabbis from Halifax were meeting victims' families who flew here to identify remains.

The News in Brief

Canada

Canadian Receives Prize

MONTREAL — For the first time, the American Chemical Society has bestowed its annual prize outside the United States. This year's James T. Grady-James H. Stack Award was presented to Dr. Joseph A. Schwarcz of Montreal. Schwarcz teaches chemistry at Vanier College and McGill University, and is a well-known media figure and lecturer.

Na'amat Trip

TORONTO — Na'amat Canada's immediate past president, Etty Danzig, will host a 12-day historical tour of Prague and Israel from Nov. 2 to 16. The trip will feature three days in Prague, including a tour of Terezin, the "model" Nazi concentration camp, followed by 10 days in Israel, including visits to Na'amat facilities. For details, call 416-488-0792.

Israel

School Year Delayed

JERUSALEM — Israel's school year failed to begin as scheduled because of a teachers' strike over wage increases. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on some public-sector employees to forgo a salary increase, saying he and the finance minister have already decided to do so.

Singer Bows To Threats

JERUSALEM — A popular Israeli performer has cancelled a planned concert in the West Bank town of Nablus because of Hamas threats. Zehava Benn, who has performed to packed halls in the Palestinian town, had disregarded the Islamic fundamentalist group's threats, but later decided to cancel her appearance after rumors that anyone attending the concert, including the singer herself, would be at risk.

Executions Condemned

JERUSALEM — Israel condemned the Palestinian Authority's recent public executions of two members of the Palestinian security forces who were convicted of murder. Israel's cabinet secretary, Danny Naveh, said the executions, at which thousands of onlookers cheered, provided more evidence for why Israel would "never agree to a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital."

Aliyah Watch

JERUSALEM — The total number of immigrants to Israel so far this year is 30,972, of whom 23,302 came from the former Soviet Union.

World

Deal Made On Properties

WARSAW — A deal reached last week between Poland's Jewish community and international Jewish groups provides for the return of 5,500 properties, including schools, synagogues, hospitals, cultural centres and cemeteries, over the next four years to a joint foundation. The foundation will be administered by the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the Union of Jewish Communities in Poland.

Lawsuits Filed

WASHINGTON — Holocaust survivors filed lawsuits last week against some of Germany's biggest and best-known companies, alleging they profited from Nazi-era slave labor. One lawsuit, filed in Brooklyn, names Volkswagen and 11 other companies, including Siemens, Daimler-Benz, Krupp, Audi, BMW and Leica Camera. The other action, filed in Newark, N.J., names only Volkswagen.

Maid Responsible: Book

AMSTERDAM — The woman who cleaned the house where Anne Frank's family hid during World War II turned the clan in to the Nazis, according to a new book. But scholars reacted cautiously, saying that more research is needed before it can be known whether it was the maid who betrayed the family.

Synagogue Fire

KHARKOV — A fire destroyed the grand hallway of the five-storey Central Choral Synagogue in this Ukrainian city. But the blaze, which is believed to have been an arson attack, did not reach the building's sanctuary. Damage is estimated at about $1 million (US). No one was injured.

Mordechai In China

SHANGHAI — Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai visited Shanghai's newly restored Ohel Rachel Synagogue on the first of a five-day visit to China. Mordechai said he had received assurances that China would not pass on technology to Iran, which could be used for weapons of mass destruction. His plane also brought medicines for the millions of flood victims throughout China.

Art May Be Returned

BRASILIA — Four paintings looted by the Nazis reportedly will be turned over to the Brazilian government. The artworks, including paintings by Pablo Picasso and Claude Monet, are valued at nearly $6 million (US). They were sold to wealthy Brazilian families after Nazi officials fled to South America with their plunder following World War II.

Rabbi Weighs Clinton Scandal

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — When Rabbi Eugene Levy launched a campaign on the eve of the 1991 High Holy Days to rally national support for Bill Clinton's presidential campaign, few of the rabbis he courted knew much about the governor from Arkansas.

Now, as Clinton battles for his very political survival, the president needs help more than ever from backers like Rabbi Levy of the Reform Congregation B'nai Israel in Little Rock, Ark.

But like many Democrats loyal to the president, Rabbi Levy said he is grappling with how to respond to Clinton's admission that he misled the American people about his affair with former White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

"I'm really struggling with the disappointment and the sadness of what's happened," said Rabbi Levy. He said he does not have an answer for many of his congregants who ask, "How can you tell us that we have to live our life with morality and support somebody who flaunts that publicly?"

While he still counts himself a strong Clinton supporter, the rabbi is not sure that he wants to go out on a limb for the president.

"Forgiveness comes with being sorry and I'm not sure that he really is. He may be sorry that he got caught," said the rabbi, who is considering another High Holy Day message of support for Clinton.

UJA Federation launches Campaign for 50

Aiming for $13.5 M increase

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The hard slogging remains ahead, but last week it was a time for festivities and celebration as the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) of UJA Federation kicked off its annual fundraising campaign.

Music, humor and dancing in the aisles were the dominant themes at the Campaign for 50 launch, held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

Several hundred supporters turned out for the event and they were entertained by the upbeat song stylings of Yovel, a six-person Israeli singing group. Comedian and impersonator Tuvia Tsafir injected his gentle brand of humor, regaling the audience with impersonations of Israeli political figures Ariel Sharon, Benjamin Netanyahu and Shimon Peres, among others.

Yovel's high-spirited, fun-filled exuberance rubbed off on the audience during the group's last numbers as participants danced the horah on stage and in the aisles in front of the stage.

Campaign co-chairs Brent Belzberg and Larry Tanenbaum injected a more sober note in the evening's festivities, as they addressed the campaign's ambitious new goal.

"This year we are aiming to take the campaign to $50 million, an increase of $13.5 million," Belzberg told the audience.

Of that amount, $6.5 million will go towards strengthening Jewish identity, $4.5 million to assisting the vulnerable and $1.5 million towards expanding rescue efforts in the former Soviet Union, he said.

Belzberg announced that the campaign was off to a running start.

More about inspiration

Triggered by a recent trip to Stratford with two of my daughters to see Man of La Mancha, my thoughts last week dealt with the fact that "inspiration is a rarer experience today than in our time."

"Where can we reach," I asked, "to find the fleeting flashes of inspiration capable of kindling sparks inside the souls of...our young people?"

I posed the question, not as a typical vanity of the "older generation," but rather as the genuine plea of a parent looking at his children and of a concerned, middle-aged adult looking at the state of the world that he has helped to create.

Most readers probably know the premise of Man of la Mancha. Nevertheless, I need to briefly relate it. The central figure, Don Quixote, is a champion of idealism. His credo is the theme song, To Dream the Impossible Dream.

But the playwright, Cervantes, true to the literary and imaginative genius that he was, complicates at many levels the espousal of the credo of idealism.

He places the credo in the mouth of a man clearly out of touch with reality, a man scorned and derided by most of his contemporaries, a man who believes he is fighting fierce monsters but is, in truth, really "tilting at windmills." Moreover, Don Quixote, the Man of la Mancha, is but a fictional character in a play within the larger play.

Cervantes cleverly, ambiguously melds the ostensibly sane, moral but hapless narrator of the inner play, who also happens to be a playwright cast into prison awaiting the Inquisition's interrogations, with his fictional, deranged protagonist, the Man of La Mancha.

The dark, dreary truths of life surround the imprisoned playwright. He is in a dungeon with cutthroats, murderers and evil brigands. Even at the end, he cannot escape his surroundings. In the foreboding atmosphere anticipating his final doom, he is summoned to his Inquisitors.

But throughout the play, until he walks off the stage and the curtain falls on him being led away by his jailers, the audience knows that the playwright clings to his higher, ennobling truths, the truths that he artfully presented to his fellow prisoners in the form of the play within the play, with the enigmatic Man of La Mancha as the spokesman for those truths.

The most poignant moments in the play within the play – and thus, we assume within the ultimate message that Cervantes intended to impart to the audience – are generated by the relationship between Quixote and Aldonza, a cynical, battered, abused urchin of the street. But in his fantasy, (Or is it more accurately, in his perceptiveness?) Quixote does not see her in the way that she sees herself. Rather, he sees her as a beautiful maiden, an inspiration to him, a source both of courage and of purpose.

He even changes her name, as if by borrowing from well-established Jewish tradition, he can thereby change her soul as well. He does not know her by the harsh-sounding Aldonza. He knows her only by the tender-sounding Dulcinea. And as Dulcinea, he relates to her, respectfully, caringly, thoughtfully, lovingly.

At first she is confused by Quixote, so different is his attitude towards her than that of the others. Then she is resentful of him for raising her hopes without being able to raise her station.

Finally, however, she is indeed transformed by him. She begins to see herself as he saw her: a beautiful being, unique and equally deserving of respect. She actually transcends the confining limits of her low, debilitating self-esteem.

The playwright's message is unequivocal: that above all else we must recognize and honor the possibilities in all human beings.

That message echoes the "music," to borrow from Harry Chapin, we sang in our youth, the rock-solid belief "that we are all special, that we all had unique destinies to fulfil, that our lives carried purpose and meaning, that nothing was beyond our ability, that we could always carry the day," that we could change the world if we only cared to.

That message is at the core of our traditional teachings as well. Rav Avraham Isaac Kook, the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine devoted his entire life to its dissemination.

"Be attached to the legions of living beings who are constantly bringing forth everything beautiful. In every corner where you turn, you are dealing with realities that have life; you always perform consequential acts, abounding with meaning and with the preciousness of vibrant life. In everything you do, you encounter sparks full of life and light, aspiring to rise above the heights. You help them and they help you."

Abraham Joshua Heschel, the brilliant philosopher/theologian, could have written much of Cervantes' dialogue for him. In Who Is Man?, a compilation of lectures Heschel delivered in 1963, he said: "It is true that the good of all counts more than the good of one, but it is the concrete individual who lends meaning to the human race. We do not think that a human being is valuable because he is a member of a race; it is rather the opposite: the human race is valuable because it is composed of human beings."

To fight the unbeatable foe
To bear with unbearable sorrow,
To run where the brave dare not go..

This is my quest
To follow that star
No matter how hopeless
No matter how far..." MBD

History of bias at IRB, former official charges

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the wake of last week's controversy surrounding the deputy chair of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) coming under fire for saying "sieg heil" and allegedly giving the Nazi salute, a former deputy chair of the IRB has come forward to say there has long been an "undercurrent" of anti-Semitism at the board.

"I encountered more anti-Jewish and anti-Israel bias in my time at the IRB than in my entire life," said Michael Schelew, who served as the board's deputy chair for 11 months in 1994.

Schelew, 47, now a Toronto immigration lawyer, told The CJN last week that the vast majority of the IRB's 170 or so members are "decent people who try to do their jobs," but that there is a "core" of members with anti-Semitic and anti-Israel views whose decisions have reflected a clear bias over the years.

That bias has translated into two main areas, he claims: Canada's acceptance of asylum-seekers from the former Soviet Union who springboard here via Israel with allegations of persecution; and the IRB's denial of asylum to Jewish claimants on the grounds that they can go to Israel under that country's Law of Return.

Schelew says that during his time at the board, some members openly expressed suspicion and disdain at Jewish refugee claimants, Jewish lawyers and even Jewish fellow board members.

However, he reserved most of his frustration for the way in which IRB chair Nurjehan Mawani has handled the latest blow-up involving the board's deputy chair, John Frecker.

Frecker has admitted saying "sieg heil" or something similar to two panelists at the IRB's Toronto headquarters nearly a year ago.

That led to a formal complaint against him by board member Jeanette Goldman, a child survivor of the Holocaust.

In July, Goldman wrote Mawani, saying she was "profoundly shocked and deeply disturbed" by Frecker's actions.

"As a very young child, I watched from a hiding place as my father was dragged away to a concentration camp and my mother was brutally murdered by the very people Mr. Frecker's gesture evoked," Goldman wrote.

In response, Mawani said Frecker "apologizes unhesitatingly and unequivocally for having offended anyone," adding she asked Frecker to apologize as well.

In a July 29 letter to Goldman, Frecker said his actions were meant as a "parody" and " in mock response" to a management tactic he considered "Stalinist."

He added "it was with some dismay" that he learned Goldman had complained.

Nevertheless, Frecker wrote he regretted "having uttered words that may be taken, even wrongly, as mocking the victims of the Holocaust. I unhesitatingly and unequivocally apologize to you and to any other individuals who may have been offended by my words."

But that was not enough for Goldman, who wrote Frecker last month to say she found it "inappropriate to categorize this matter as one between you and me, and to assume that such conduct would only be offensive to me and 'to any other persons who may have been offended.' Many members were offended."

Goldman called Frecker's actions "indefensible."

Jewish groups expressed concern.

Ellen Cole, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, said Congress is not happy with the board's response.

"We're not satisfied with [Frecker's] letter of apology, or with the way this was resolved."

The incident "does leave in doubt the integrity of [Frecker's] position. If this was a parody, it wasn't funny."

Karen Mock of B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) League for Human Rights said, "I don't think we're dealing with someone with neo-Nazi leanings, but it does appear that the remarks and the complaint, and the way they were handled, have taken place in a climate that is tense."

The League, she added, will continue to look into the work environment at the IRB, as well as allegations of anti-Semitism there.

Both groups have asked for a meeting with Mawani.

For his part, Schelew believes Mawani has "done the bare minimum" in this case.

"She claims to have zero tolerance for racism and prejudice, but it took her 10 months to investigate – and only after [Goldman] complained. Some zero tolerance."

Schelew says Mawani's handling of the matter has been "incompetent" – a word he also uses to describe how she and the board managed refugee claims from ex-Soviets coming here from Israel.

Since 1989, Canada has granted asylum to hundreds of ex-Soviets who came here from Israel.

In 1994, Israel asked Canada to stop accepting the asylum seekers, calling their tales of persecution spurious.

Despite the fact that the acceptance rate has declined, the issue continues to be a sore point between the Jewish community and the IRB. And Schelew says Mawani "continues to mismanage the board's handling of these claims."

Over the years, most claimants were accepted in Montreal, where board members "enjoyed the discomfort of the Jewish community. People were gleeful that the community was annoyed."

Schelew worked hard to reverse board policy on ex-Soviet Jews, but became disillusioned. "I kept being reminded that I'm Jewish and that I could not be objective."

The flip side was the IRB's refusal of refugee status to one Jewish women on the grounds she could go live in Israel. That decision outraged Jewish officials and refugee activists, who saw strong hints of anti-Semitism in it.

In late 1994, a fed-up Schelew finally resigned. "I realized that the board, in its current form, could not be made to function properly."

As for Frecker, "he's not anti-Semitic. He just exercised poor judgment."

Paul Hardy, a spokesperson for Mawani, told The CJN the matter will be further investigated.

"The question is how to proceed," he said.

Hardy added there is "every likelihood" that Mawani will meet with B'nai Brith and CJC. "This is being taken very seriously."

Last week, Maureen Silcoff, a former member of the IRB, wrote Mawani complaining about several board officials, including Frecker for allegedly interfering with a decision, and board member Lubomyr Luciuk for alleged inappropriate behavior and a negative remark about Jews.

My best wishes for a year filled with Good Health, Happiness & Peace

CJC intervenes for survivors in mental hospitals

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has decided to intervene on behalf of nearly 1,000 Holocaust survivors still languishing in Israeli mental hospitals.

"We think there are skeletons in the closet and we're determined to bring them into the open," CJC president Moshe Ronen said in a telephone interview with The CJN from Latvia, where he was on an official visit.

To this end, the CJC has asked permission of Israeli Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi to make a formal submission to a commission looking into the matter.

Ronen said that Hanegbi has agreed to meet with him on the matter at the end of October.

And Ronen has already spoken to Israel's Ambassador to Canada David Sultan about the CJC's concerns.

The CJC became involved when Gustava Weiner, a Montreal woman, was attempting to find out if her brother, Moishe (Marian) Rosner, a survivor, was in one of the mental hospitals. In Israel, she was refused this information on the grounds of medical confidentiality and told that, in their own interests, the names of the patients thus classified could not be released.

"It's not only my brother, but there may also be an auntie or cousins, and other Canadian survivors may have relatives there," Weiner said.

She believes her brother, whom she last saw at the age of five, was hidden in a convent and later his name appeared on a list of names in lower Silesia.

Her parents, of Przemysl, Poland, died in the Holocaust, along with other relatives.

The Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv on Aug. 7 said that 900 to 960 survivors were being denied the use of "tens of millions" owing to them in improving their own care.

"There may be hundreds of survivors in Canada concerned about these patients and if we make a submission we will ask all the Jewish communities in Canada to provide us with information," said Ronen.

He added: "This looks to me like the bureaucracy in Israel have bungled this and we want fast action to correct it. This is our main concern because these patients are elderly and they need comfort in their last few years."

According to the Ma'ariv report, the Israeli government accepted 1,000 Holocaust survivors from Germany in 1952 classified as mentally ill, waiting four years to make the decision. The newspaper quoted sources saying these survivors were said to be "crazy" and were hidden from view so as not to embarrass the government.

The Ma'ariv report says Israeli Comptroller General Shmuel Tzur has denied requests from the patients to use their money for air conditioning units, TV sets or birthday parties on the grounds that such requests would benefit other patients.

The newspaper report claims that one patient eats an inordinate amount of ground beef because he has been denied money to get new teeth.

Another Israeli newspaper, Ha'aretz, said Tzur denied receiving such requests from patients and would have granted them. He also denied that his office is trying to save the patients' funds so that after their death the state will inherit the money.

Moshe Ronen

Ronen said the CJC wants to interview Israeli psychiatrists who have recently spoken out about the sad conditions the survivors are in. As well, he said, the CJC wants to interview bureaucrats who run the mental hospitals.

About 120 of these survivors are in the Abrabanel Hospital.

The Knesset legal affairs committee held a special session during the summer recess in the wake of the Ma'ariv report. According to the newspaper Ha'aretz's Knesset correspondent, the committee severely criticized the Office of the General Custodian and the Ministry of Health.

Among committee members were chair Hanan Porat (National Religious Party), Ruby Rivlin (Likud) and Ophir Pines and Shevach Weiss, both of the Labor party.

The commission appointed to check into the allegations is headed by Judge Emeritus Yaacov Bazak, and includes former absorption minister Yair Tzaban, former Knesset chair Dov Shilanski, psychiatrist Dr. Ovri Zabo and former banking ombudsman Meir Khat.

thanks to $13 million in contributions from leading donors.

"What's more astounding is the fact that this already includes over $3 million in increased giving," he said. "As we start this campaign, the average increase on each gift is already 30 percent."

Tanenbaum called the Campaign for 50 – which corresponds with Israel's 50th birthday – historic, one that "will forever change our campaign and our community."

"Today we have a new challenge, not one based on extreme crises or perils of war but rather the challenge facing a mature, caring community which is making choices about what kind of future we will build together," he said.

"For the past several years, UJA Federation has been devising ambitious plans for dramatic changes in services in order to respond to our tremendous growth and to deal with the huge cutbacks in government funding. The UJA Federation leadership, through consultations with community agencies, schools, synagogues and donors, put them all together and determined that it will cost a minimum of $50 million annually to put them into play," Belzberg said.

Approximately 27,000 contributors give money to the annual campaign, an average of $1,350 per contributor.

One of the campaign's next big events is the Super Sunday telethon, which is scheduled for Sept. 13.

They don't understand

Is there anything as incongruous as Party Québécois (PQ) officials solemnly invoking canons of democracy to justify their patently anti-democratic beliefs?

First there was the shocking statement by former premier Jacques Parizeau on the night of the last referendum attributing the separatists' defeat to "money and the ethnic vote."

Then there were the oft-repeated proclamations by Premier Lucien Bouchard that the courts had no role whatsoever to play in establishing rules for secession, that the matter of Quebec's secession from Canada fell exclusively within the political and not the legal domain.

Most recently, just last week, we witnessed yet another manifestation of the PQ doctrine of democratic theory.

Trying to explain his previous day's statement to the media concerning his government's resolve to adhere to a 50 percent-plus-one-vote threshold in the next referendum, Quebec Deputy Premier Bernard Landry said: "I spoke of our brothers and sisters, our compatriots in the cultural communities; I extended a brotherly hand to them. But the day political correctness prevents us from even alluding to those statistics, it will be a curb on democratic speech." (Our emphasis)

The "statistics" to which he was referring were the constant, overwhelmingly federalist, voting preferences of his "compatriots in the cultural communities." Because of these preferences, obviously frustrating to his fellow Pequistes, Landry has concluded the minimum majority requirement in the next referendum for secession talks to begin, must only be 50 percent-plus-one-vote. Anything more than 50 percent-plus-one-vote places the bar too high. And "if we put the bar too high," Landry warned, "it could give...the cultural communities a veto right which would not be healthy for Quebec society, either for them or for us."

This, then, is what the deputy premier of Quebec would characterize as "democratic speech." To be sure, it is his democratic right to speak his opinion. But make no mistake, his opinion is bereft of any deep understanding or appreciation of true democracy. Moreover it touches the edges of very menacing territory.

True democracy does not differentiate the eligible voters; rather, it differentiates the ideas and the ideologies that are being voted upon. Yet, the deputy premier clearly does differentiate voters. For him, there are the "cultural communities" and the non-cultural communities, presumably, the old-stock Québécois francophone. On the subject of secession from Canada, the vote of the cultural communities in Quebec, he implies, though legally valid, is somehow morally invalid.

Quebec's possible secession from Canada, he implies, is really an argument to be resolved, not by all Quebecers, but preferably by the non-cultural communities of Quebec. Following Landry's logic, it is neither far-fetched nor implausible to imagine some dyed-in-the wool, "old-stock" Québécois advocating the disqualification of the cultural communities from voting in the referendum.

Anathasios Hadjis, the vice-president of the Hellenic Congress of Quebec succinctly, painfully, defined the offense in the deputy premier's words. "Implicit in Mr. Landry's statement is that the votes of members of cultural communities in Quebec are somehow different from votes expressed by anyone else in Quebec."

True democracy covets less the outcome of a vote than it does the process of that vote. Democracy lives in the details of rules, procedures, fairness and due process. Its hallmark is the pre-eminence of the rule of law that itself rests on the inviolate belief: one person, one vote, all equal in measure.

The PQ hierarchy, coveting only the outcome and not the process of democracy, just does not seem to understand this.

Daughter of Israel reviled in The Governess

Your reviewer of the film The Governess (CJN, Aug. 20) warns that it "leaves the audience hungry." It left me and my movie companion downright emetic.

Perhaps the moral perspective of Sandra Goldbacher, the movie's writer and director, justifies the adultery and the destruction of a family because it was dysfunctional anyway. She may even believe that there is moral sanction for committing theft in return for being cheated. Apart from Goldbacher's personal morality, the movie makes an inauthentic portrayal of a "daughter of Israel," if I may uncynically use that term, particularly of one living in the 19th century.

The movie leaves the audience hungry because they do not know if the portrayal is of an aberrant, wayward Jewish daughter who keeps Jewish ritual tradition in the secrecy of her room but is absolutely bereft of the morality that is part and parcel of that tradition, or if it is a portrayal of a typical, albeit "adventurous," Jewish young woman. If the former, then the movie was merely offensive to our Jewish sensibilities. If the latter, then the movie was anti-Semitic.

Wants to prove Torontonians are friendly

John Freeman's letter (CJN, Aug. 20) about the difficulty of making friends in Toronto touched a nerve. It is not the first time I have heard such a tale. One story (perhaps apocryphal) concerned a couple who moved here – from Winnipeg, I think it was. They decided the best way to give their social life a kick start was to throw a big party and invited everyone they had met since they first arrived. People gladly accepted. The party was a roaring success. But they didn't get even one invitation in return.

I came to Toronto 25 years ago after living in Montreal and New York. And yes, Toronto is different. And the Jews in Toronto are different.

I first noticed it at an oneg Shabbat after Friday night services at a synagogue when we first arrived here as strangers. No one took the initiative to speak to us. It struck me then that Jews were like chameleons, taking on the qualities of the communities in which they live. I was wrong, though. It is not only Jews who have these qualities in Toronto.

Of course since then, we have made friends.

The funny thing is that when you get to know people here they are just as warm and friendly and helpful and understanding as people anywhere else.

But there's one more thing we can do, spurred on by Freeman's letter, and that is change things.

If you, John Freeman, invite us, I promise to invite you back. Better still, if you want, we'll invite you first and I'm confident you'll return the invitation.

Pakistani general surrendered to Jew

It was enlightening to read that Lt.-Gen. J.F.R. Jacob was appointed governor of the Indian province of Goa. (CJN, Aug. 30) The statement that he is the first Jew to achieve such a high office is refreshing; however, the report that Jacob is of Iraqi heritage is incorrect.

In fact, Jacob is from the Bene Israel community of India, a group of Jews who had settled in this part of India as a result of a shipwreck nearly 2,000 years ago.

A very interesting episode involving Jacob took place during the Bangladesh War in 1971. The Indian army, under the command of then Maj.-Gen. Jacob, GOC, Eastern Command, had surrounded the Pakistani army and surrender terms were offered to the Pakistani general for him to sign. He refused to sign unless he first spoke with then-prime minister Indira Gandhi. When Gandhi asked why he refused to sign, the Pakistani general told her that not only did he lose the war, but that she was adding insult to injury by making him sign surrender terms in front of a Jew.

Seeking uncle and cousins in Canada

I was born in 1936 in Pervouralsk, Russia. My father was arrested during Stalin repressions and killed in 1937. My mother, Waisfeld Hana Iosifovna, was born in Staszow, Poland, in 1901. Before World War II my mother's older brother left for Canada and her younger brother for Argentina.

My Canadian uncle was born between 1895 and 1898 and lived in Toronto. He found us in 1957-1958 and sent us some letters and pictures. So I knew about my Canadian cousins, born in 1933, 1938, 1945. Now I don't have any letters and pictures, because during Cold War times my mother had to stop any connections with capitalist representatives. Three hundred years since the Baal Shem Tov was born

By RABBI J. IMMANUEL SCHOCHET

This year marks the tercentenary of the birth of the founder of the chassidic movement. Rabbi Israel ben Eliezer, known as the Baal Shem Tov – Master of the Good Name, was born on the 18th of Elul 5458 (1698), in a small Ukrainian village called Okup.

Rabbi Israel's personal life, especially the first half, is mostly shrouded in folklore and in countless legends. He was orphaned at an early age and worked as a teaching assistant, beadle and part-time shochet. To the outside world, he appeared as a simple person, but in secret, he studied assiduously, acquiring the extensive knowledge in Rabbinics and the Kabbalah that became manifest in his public career.

Early on he became associated with a secret organization of Nistarim, saints and mystics who acted in total anonymity; eventually he became their leader. These men would visit numerous towns and villages in the guise of simple folk, noting firsthand the social and religious status and needs of their fellow Jews. To the best of their ability they brought material and spiritual succor to multitudes of people acutely suffering from the demoralizing effects of the upheavals and persecutions of the preceding century. Thus were laid the foundations for the chassidic movement.

The Baal Shem Tov's public career started in 1734. From then on, he openly taught, preached and disseminated the ideas and principles of Chassidism.

In 1740, he settled in the town of Miedzyboz, where he remained until his death 20 years later. There he developed an academy in which he taught his disciples through formal lectures. At the same time, however, he continued to travel extensively to convey his message to the masses by means of popular stories and parables.

The Baal Shem Tov did not compose books. He created souls, people, extraordinary leaders, not texts. His mastery of the exoteric and esoteric traditions of the Torah emerged in the scholars who became his disciples. They included some of the great talmudic authorities of the time who held prominent rabbinic positions: Rabbi Meir Margolius of Ostrog; Rabbi Gershon of Kotov; Rabbi David Heilperin of Zaslov; Rabbi Israel Charif of Satanov; Rabbi Dov Ber of Mezhirech; Rabbi Jacob Joseph of Polnoy; Rabbi Joseph Joel Heilperin of Stephan; and many others. These renowned rabbis became fervent followers of the Baal Shem Tov, cited his teachings, and they spoke most highly of their master's scholarship and holiness.

His teaching of the masses in synagogues and marketplaces, and especially the content of his message, were quite revolutionary. Until his time, a radical division separated the scholarly elite who prided themselves on the historical Jewish pursuit of Torah knowledge from the generally unlearned masses, who struggled to survive. The former forgot their sorrows in their studies, focusing on the traditional goal of being a talmid chacham, a Torah scholar. They had contempt for the unlearned, for those in the opposite category, am ha'aretz.

The concept of am ha'aretz, however, has two meanings. In normative use it is a derogatory term for the illiterate: people of the land, the common masses who did not pursue the ideal of Torah knowledge that earmarks and safeguards Jewish identity and continuity.

Am ha'aretz, however, also is a generic term for the people of Israel as the people of the earth, i.e., the people for whose sake the earth was created. Its emphasis is on Israel's being the people chosen to receive the Torah to sanctify and sublimate God's earth. It signifies the special relationship between God and Israel, "Israel, my first-born child." In this context every individual, scholar and simpleton alike, is most precious. Love of Israel is tantamount to love of God. In the Baal Shem Tov's words: True love of the Father implies love for His children.

The religious and social establishment of eastern Europe focused on the derogatory aspect of am ha'aretz. They kept themselves apart from the masses, regarding them with disdain. In principle they were justified in doing so, for the latter's neglect of Torah study surely threatened the very survival of Judaism.

The Baal Shem Tov did not disagree with the traditional principles per se. In his view, however, the circumstances of his times demanded a modified approach. The vast majority of the masses were demoralized, forced into their state of illiteracy by external conditions and not by a wilful neglect of Torah. Thus he focused on the generic, literal sense of am ha'aretz and emphasized the intrinsic essence of each individual rather than his external reality. He sought to awaken the Jewish soul, to make people conscious of their true being and lead them to actualize their potential.

In a typical teaching, he thus interpreted the verse "For you (Israel) shall be an eretz chefetz (earth, or land, of desire), says God" (Malachi 3:12): Just as the greatest scientists will never discover the limits of the enormous natural resources that God has implanted in the earth, neither will anyone ever find the limits of the great treasures that lie within Israel, God's "land of desire." And he concluded: "I want to make Israel yield the kind of produce which the Almighty's 'land of desire' is capable of yielding!"

Many writers on Chassidism note the Baal Shem Tov's involvement with the masses and their enthusiastic adoption of his teachings. They read it as a popular and emotional uprising against the establishment and the strictures of Halachah. Nothing could be further from the truth. It is an amateurish distortion that ignores the explicit and implicit teachings and practices of the Baal Shem Tov and his disciples.

Strictly speaking, there is nothing novel or revolutionary in the doctrines and activities of the Baal Shem Tov and Chassidism. They derive from the very premises of the traditional sources of Judaism. The originality of Chassidism is not in innovation but in emphasis.

The Baal Shem Tov and his school fused the exoteric and the esoteric, Halachah and the mystical dimension of the Torah. He emphasized the religious experience, spirituality, consciousness of the Divine in the pursuit of Torah and mitzvot, as opposed to a perfunctory observance of religious obligations. Torah and mitzvot must be internalized, living realities that affect the person, not only in their actual performance, but also thereafter.

The Baal Shem Tov presents a philosophy of holism that does not recognize a dichotomy of the physical and the spiritual. The earth must be raised to heaven and heaven brought down to earth. The biblical admonition of "Know Him in all your ways" (Proverbs 3:6), i.e., even in your physical existence and material pursuits, is a pervasive theme in his teachings. Asceticism, therefore, is seen to be a barrier to the ideal form of worship. It induces a morbid frame of mind and precludes the requisite joy and optimism implied by true faith and trust in God.

Deveikut (communion with G-d), kavanah (conscious intention and devotion), enthusiasm and joy are major concepts of Chassidism. There is great emphasis on prayer, as it is the most immediate and direct relationship with the Divine. Most crucial is the Baal Shem Tov's concept of hashgachah peratit, which he interprets to mean a pervasive recognition of Divine Providence governing every detail in God's creation. These principles relate to all. Ordinary people can attain these goals no less than scholars and saints. "God seeks the heart," and than can be offered by everyone, without exception.

The central role of Torah study in Judaism is not diminished one iota, albeit with the caution never to forget that we are dealing with God's Torah, manifesting the Divine Will.

At the core of all is the intrinsic unity of God, Torah and Israel. The Baal Shem Tov once summarized his mission "to move all Jews to love of God, love of Torah and love of every Jew," with full realization that these are inseparable and interdependent. None can be true and whole without compounding the other two. His concern for, and involvement with, the illiterate masses, was not only a means towards the end of bringing them closer to God and Torah, but also an imperative of unconditional love for every Jew as an end in itself.

The Baal Shem Tov's teachings, widely disseminated by an unusual corps of extra-ordinary masters and teachers of Chassidism over the past three centuries, wrought a spiritual revolution that is fermenting to this day. There is not a single Jewish group or movement that has not been affected by Chassidism. This great sage's doctrines and practices, once suspect as revolutionary novelties, have generally been adopted universally as normative values and perspectives.

The Baal Shem Tov foresaw this historical change in attitude. In an unusual document, he describes an extraordinary vision of a celestial encounter with the soul of the Messiah. He asked the Messiah when he would finally come to earth to free the people of Israel from the miseries of the galut (exile). The Messiah replied: "When your wellsprings shall disperse without," i.e., throughout the world.

The wellsprings of the Baal Shem Tov, the insight and inspiration of his teachings, are already springing forth throughout the globe. Jewish communities all over now mark the tercentenary of his birth with special efforts to bring that vision to full and speedy realization.

A time for new experiences

By Jennifer Fox in Halifax

The usual school necessities sit in plastic bags on my floor: three binders, five packages of loose-leaf paper, a box of pens and a pair of oven mitts.

Since when are oven mitts school supplies? This year is going to be a little bit different.

September is a month of beginnings – a new school year and for some, a new place to call home. But there's also a feeling of repetition, of familiarity. Before last year, every September followed a pattern. Receive my schedule, complain about my teachers and restock my school supplies. The pattern is now lost; I'm making it up as I go along.

In September 1997, I left home and entered university. Everything was new – the city, the people, the independence. I lived in Alex Hall, the King's College women's residence, and acquired new skills: how to stick to a monthly budget, most of the time; how to pay the phone bill. I learned which dryer would actually dry my clothes for only 75 cents and which nights to book the TV. Slowly, the secrets of living on campus were uncovered.

Life in Alex Hall was good. My room was cleaned for me. My friends were just across the hall. My meals were made without my lifting a finger. OK, I couldn't always identify what I was eating. What exactly was American-style lasagna and why was it that color?

It didn't matter. I was an independent woman, albeit a very sheltered independent woman. Residence students don't worry about rent, about utility bills, about shopping for groceries. They don't have to wake up early to get to class because class is only two minutes away. My independence wasn't complete, but I knew what I was doing.

September 1998 – time to grow up a little bit more. I return to Halifax, not to the comforts of Alex Hall, but to three housemates and a house of our own.

I often think about utensils. Which utensils are essential to a kitchen, which ones do I actually know how to use? Meat preparation terrifies me. I own a whisk, but do I know what it's for? When I'm standing in the grocery store, will I know which brand of pickles I like? Will I become like so many students before me and live on macaroni and cheese for the next eight months? I don't even know how to make macaroni and cheese.

This September, there are more changes than household chores. The High Holy Days approach and bring more questions. Where will I break the fast on Yom Kippur? Which Halifax synagogue will I attend? What will it be like to go to High Holy Day services alone?

Every Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we had small family traditions. As I sat beside my father, the fringes from his tallit would fall into my lap. I would pick up the row of string and begin to braid. The strings are soft and smell of old books. We would race home after Neilah because we were so hungry, only to have a light snack and fall into bed. This year, instead of returning to a house filled with hungry and tired family members, I well return to three well-fed and energetic housemates.

Things change. A month that was once about old ways becomes a time for new experiences. September now represents challenges for the year. Learn how to cook or be hungry. Find somewhere to break the fast or do it alone. Eventually I'll master this year's tasks, I hope. Soon September will come again, teaching me new lessons for the year ahead.

When the few are in the majority

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The title of this column represents an obvious oxymoron, for "the few" are by definition a minority – and a minority cannot be a majority. But wait.

I am talking about money, and money has a life of its own, with rules that apply nowhere else.

First, the money aspect. UJA and UIA drives are beginning all over North America, and in Toronto the campaign is already in full swing. It is my understanding that from the very beginning it has been a great success in that more and more people have increased their levels of giving.

Now to the minority aspect. It has long been known that in any campaign for any community, and for any cause, 20 percent of the givers contribute 80 percent of the total. In a recent issue of the American Benefactor, some additional figures were supplied that intrigued me, and that I think will be of interest to the readers of this column.

There are various classes of donors, even in the 20 percent bracket that supplies most of the funds of any campaign. Take the richest first. Among those making $1 million or more per year, 20 percent give most of the money in their own income group. And strangely, a similar relationship exists also among people who earn between $10,000 and $15,000. Here, 10 percent contribute more than half of all the contributions made.

The article suggests, therefore, that in fact, it is not the income level that determines the relative amount of a gift. It is the generosity of some on one side and the lack of it on the other. In the lowest income group, which is quite clearly composed of people with very little money to spend, there is a small group that is far more charitable than the rest who give little or nothing.

Since these statistics apply across the board, it is well for those in reasonably comfortable economic conditions to ask themselves: Where do I fit into the 20/80 range? The question is likely to remain unanswered, for such figures – scaled along various income groups – are either not available or not being released. In the end, it is the generosity of the individual that counts.

But money is not the only subject where the minority-majority angle prevails. Take the Jewish people's cultural contributions to humanity. We are a very small group and we have added an enormous amount to the religious and intellectual treasure house of civilization. Or take any community: a small group does most of the volunteer work for the benefit of all.

It all comes down to this: all the way from money, to culture, to religion, the devotion of people, their commitment to certain ideals, and their willingness to give of themselves in time, effort and money represents the foundation of society. Whether we belong to the minority or majority is up to us. Everyone can be among the benefactors on the one hand or the beneficiaries on the other.

Throughout history, the Jews have chosen (or were chosen) to be among the benefactors, and have paid a high price for it. In our individual lives, fortunately, the price is not that high.

Time to say bye to summer

By Erica Horn in Montreal

My summer is sadly slowly coming to an end. It has been a long, busy, yet relaxing four months.

As I boarded the bus at camp, headed for the airport, my friend wiped the tears off my cheek and said, "The key to not missing your camp friends so much during the winter is to keep the summer alive as long as possible."

Photos plastered all over my wall, camp music mixes, incessant usage of the internet, long distance phone bills and numerous trips across the border are ways in which I intend to do exactly that. However, at the same time, a reality check is mandatory. The school year is inevitable. The snow will fall, I'll have papers to write, midterms to prepare for, swim school to teach, and more snow will fall. Yet, throughout the 10 months, I know I will have something to look forward to.

I sat listening to the radio the other day, trying to remind myself of events that occurred at the beginning of my summer, which seemed like an eternity ago. At the beginning of May, I drove to New York City with the two other co-editors of the Hillel Hub, the Jewish student newspaper distributed across numerous campuses in Montreal. We were going to a conference organized by the Jewish Student Press Service. The panel that sparked our attention the most was entitled What Makes a Story Jewish? Some students answered that a story is Jewish, if and only if, it discusses a specifically Jewish subject. I disagree. I think that a story can be considered Jewish provided that it promotes anything Jewish, from Jewish values to Israel, or even simply Jewish food.

Many Jews are involved in non-Jewish things, and it would seem narrow-minded to classify a Jewish story as something solely dealing with Jewish events or Jews acting for Jewish causes. Take, for example, the CA Marche AIDS Walk. While the cause is not "specifically" Jewish, there are Jews with AIDS and there are Jews involved in raising money for this important cause.

Most importantly, the event is a charity. Tzedakah and tikkun olam are Jewish values emphasized in Jewish homes, taught in Jewish day schools and preached in synagogues. Helping those in need and offering others whatever you can in order to better their lives are an essential part of leading a Jewish life.

Monica Lewinsky, on the other hand, is considered a Jewish story, not because she promotes Jewish values, but rather because one of her parents is Jewish. She is a Jewish person seeking some attention from the public. (Some would consider this a Jewish characteristic!) An absolute necessity to define a story as Jewish is the presence of any Jewish element, be it obvious or subtle.

Although I may spend these next months longing to be with my camp friends and in camp, I must make the best of the time, as we all must. I am going to keep myself busy so that by the time I return to camp, I will have stories and experiences to share with all the people I have anxiously waited to see. There is no need to pout around the house because the winter is inevitable if we ever want the summer to come around again. If we become involved with different organizations, within the Jewish community or outside of it, it is important to realize we are demonstrating Jewish values nonetheless.

If you are as fortunate as I am to have two days of class a week (I don't mean to brag), instead of trying desperately to tan through the skylight, because it won't work, take initiative, get involved and lend a hand.

Quiet diplomacy not enough in settling wartime claims

By Sheldon Kirshner

Unrelieved pressure finally forced Swiss banks and Swiss, Italian, German and French insurance companies to agree to settle wartime claims with Jews last month.

Facing economic sanctions and class-action suits which may well have crippled their operations in the United States, they finally relented, closing a chapter of the Holocaust.

Once the banks were onside, it was just a question of time before the insurance firms came on board. The settlements, coming within days of each other, underlined an important point. Quiet diplomacy in itself is never enough. A little shouting and the threat of litigation helps.

Nothing concentrates the mind like the loss of potential profits. This, surely, explains why two German automobile manufacturers – Volkswagen and Daimler-Benz – have decided in principle to compensate former slave laborers. And it is why Jewish organizations will continue to press claims against German banks that profited from the Holocaust.

Jews deposited money in Swiss banks and bought insurance policies out of a misplaced faith the system would not betray them or their heirs.

After the war, in far too many instances, the survivors, their children and/or their relatives were, for all practical purposes, stiffed by the banks and the insurance companies. Incredibly enough, they were asked to provide death certificates to prove that their loved ones had been murdered. It was an exercise in cynicism, cruelty and surrealism.

When the Swiss government, at the urging of the World Jewish Congress, took an inventory of dormant accounts in 1962, it found relatively little, and insinuated that the issue was closed.

As for the insurance companies, they clung to the alibi that their records had been destroyed during the war or seized by post-war Communist regimes.

The explanations were accepted, and there the matter rested until the mid-1990s, when a renewed spirit of inquiry and a burning desire for justice emerged.

In 1995, on the 50th anniversary of the end of the war, the Swiss Bankers' Association offered to resolve the problem. The World Jewish Congress rejected the paltry amount, and the battle was joined.

Responding to a chorus of international criticism whose ramifications could affect profitability, Swiss banks and private enterprises set up a $190-million (US) humanitarian fund for Holocaust survivors. And in line with efforts to appease critics, the Swiss government announced plans to create a multi-billion-dollar foundation to assist victims of oppression and poverty, and it appointed commissions to investigate dormant accounts and Switzerland's role during the war.

These gestures were ultimately insufficient. In May this year, amid calls for a global settlement, New Jersey became the first of a number of state assemblies and cities to approve sanctions against Swiss banks. The following month, seeing the handwriting on the wall, the banks offered $600 million. The sum was deemed insulting.

Cognizant that full U.S. sanctions were due to click into place on Sept. 1, the banks offered $1.2 billion. The settlement was accepted. The parties to the accord were Credit Suisse and the Union Bank of Switzerland, the largest banks in the country.

As these developments unfolded, the insurance companies reached the belated conclusion that they had to make good on unpaid policies. Two weeks ago, five out of 16 firms – Assicurazioni Generali, Zurich Allied, Allianz, AXA Group and Winterhur signed a memorandum to settle all outstanding claims.

Money talks.

Daimler-Benz colluded with Nazis

It's no secret that major industrial concerns in Germany profited from Hitler's war of aggression. Daimler-Benz, the manufacturer of the celebrated Mercedes automobile, was one of them.

In 1990, historian Bernard Bellon thoroughly documented this relationship in a masterful book entitled Mercedes in Peace and War. Now, in an intriguing study based on formerly inaccessible East German archives and previously closed Daimler-Benz records, Neil Gregor takes the story one step further.

Daimler-Benz in the Third Reich (Yale University Press), the volume under review, traces the connection between the company and the Nazi state and the degree to which it exploited slave laborers – prisoners of war and concentration camp inmates – to maximize profits.

Formed in 1926, Daimler-Benz took full advantage of the opportunities offered by the rearmament of Germany after the Nazis' rise to power in 1933. By Gregor's reckoning, the chairman of the company's supervisory board, Emil Georg von Stauss, was one of the first industrialists to establish contact with the Nationalist Socialist party.

As a result of its relations with the government, Daimler-Benz won contracts to build military vehicles, tanks and aircraft engines. Business was not affected by the fact that the wives of three of the directors were of Jewish or partly Jewish origin.

The war ushered in a tremendous period of growth for Daimler-Benz. Gross profits continually rose, hitting peaks in 1943 and 1944, while the work force increased from 42,776 in 1939 to 68,961 in 1944.

By the end of the war, Daimler-Benz was in good financial shape, with additional plants in France, Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union.

In response to Allied bombing raids on its facilities, Daimler-Benz moved its productive capacity to smaller factory sites, then to huge caves which had been dug out by countless forced laborers.

Prisoners of war toiled under extremely punishing conditions, Gregor writes. Physical violence was sanctioned as a means of keeping order, and "sloppy work" habits brought swift and merciless consequences.

The treatment of Jewish concentration camp workers was just as brutal and barbaric, and many died of hunger, cold, illness and beatings. Gregor discloses that the pressure to supply Jewish workers came from Daimler-Benz.

As he puts it: "Jewish workers were not procured out of a humanitarian desire to protect them (as was often claimed by industry after the war). It was rather the case that they were cynically instrumentalized in pursuit of short-term company interests in a specific context (acute short-term labor shortage, demands to raise production) and then abandoned once these interests had been achieved. The Jews were deployed as a 'stop-gap' measure in the interests of securing a smooth continuity in labor supply, and thus of production, until better replacements had been found."

According to his figures, Daimler-Benz had at its disposal in 1944 26,958 forced foreign workers, 4,887 prisoners of war and thousands of concentration camp inmates.

Being exceptionally flexible from an operational point of view and farsighted strategically, Daimler-Benz converted to peace-time production without missing a beat. Its upscale clientele, both in Germany and abroad, would not be deprived of the sleek sedans for which Daimler-Benz is renowned today.

The Jews of India

By SABRINA KERBEL

It is a little known fact that India has an unbroken record of more than 2,000 years of hospitality to Jews.

Jews there enjoyed political, economic, religious and intellectual freedom. In addition, as a result of the rigid caste system they integrated, but did not assimilate.

The Jewish community in India is comprised of three distinct groups: the Bene Israel, the Cochin Jews, and Baghdadi, Iraqi, Persian and Yemenite Jews. The main centres of Jewish concentration are Bombay, Cochin and Calcutta.

The most commonly accepted date of arrival in India of the Bene Israel is 732-730 BCE (before the destruction of the First Temple) when they first settled in the villages of the Konkan, south of Bombay, and then eventually moved to Bombay.

The exact date of arrival of the Cochin Jews is also disputed, but certainly by 4 CE there is evidence of a Jewish community in Kerela. The Baghdadi, Iraqi, Persian and Yemenite Jews came to India in the late 1700s and early 1800s. They settled primarily in Bombay and Calcutta.

The Jewish influence on the cultural mosaic of Bombay is evident from the many communal and public institutions built as a result of Jewish generosity. This vibrant Jewish community also produced many creative people – journalists, authors, and artists in the Indian film and stage industry. Four Jews have received the Padrna Shri, the Indian government's highest award to outstanding individuals in various fields of endeavor.

The Jewish population in India never exceeded 29,000, and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 resulted an exodus of Jews from India. The 1981 census which indicated a total of just 5,518 Jews in India. Between 1948 and 1970, approximately 23,000 Jews from India settled in Israel. Today, there are fewer than 4,500 Jews left.

There is no record of the number of Jews from India who have settled in Canada. Some came directly from India, while others first settled in England, the United States or Israel before finally settling in Canada. They are scattered across the country from Halifax to Vancouver, with the majority living in and around Montreal and Toronto.

In 1979, Congregation BINA, which in Hebrew means reason or understanding, was formed in Toronto. It organizes High Holy Day services using Sephardi prayer books and singing traditional Bene Israel melodies. Each year, families come from across Canada and the United States to attend the services and various social events held throughout the year.

The formation of Congregation BINA unites this small community. It provides a network and support to members who are first generation immigrants in Canada, and it helps the younger generations learn and appreciate their unique heritage. It can be said that it bridges the modern families of today with their rich and ancient history.

Russian consular records

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

One night in November 1933, a convoy of U.S. army trucks pulled up in front of a locked and deserted Russian government compound in Washington, D.C., to undertake a mission that was both hushed and rushed. Obeying official orders from higher up, a platoon of American soldiers broke into the premises and began removing boxes of files – 564 in all – that they shipped under cover of night to storage facilities in Washington and Brooklyn.

Despite the operation's secrecy, the Washington Post carried a front-page photo of the army's shady manoeuvre the next day, along with a story explaining why Gen. Douglas MacArthur had ordered the Russian records confiscated.

The boxes held files containing a wide variety of personal documents relating to more than 80,000 former Russian subjects, predominantly Jews, living in the United States and Canada. The files had been amassed from about 1898 to roughly 1922 by representatives of the Imperial Russian government headquartered in Washington and elsewhere. These loyal representatives of the czarist government continued to serve Russian immigrants in North America for a decade after their ties with Russia were severed following the 1917 Revolution.

MacArthur realized that many lives could be endangered if the files, abandoned since 1926, fell into Soviet hands. He was forced to act suddenly because then president Franklin Roosevelt had just announced that the United States was belatedly extending diplomatic recognition to the Soviet Union and that an ambassador of the Stalin regime was due in Washington the next day.

The Soviets were infuriated by the American move and demanded the immediate return of their records. The Americans refused. The U.S. State Department kept the files until 1949 and, after shredding an indeterminate number of them, transferred the remainder to the U.S. National Archives, where they were locked away for more than three decades. Owing to poor storage conditions, many were damaged.

In the mid-1980s, archival officials inventoried the collection. Discovering that part of it had originated in Russian consular offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, they loaned that part to the National Archives of Canada.

By then rumors had reached a few American-Jewish genealogists, including the late Rabbi Malcolm Stern, that these inaccessible records were a treasure trove for Jewish family tree researchers. Seeing a chance for an inspection in Ottawa, Rabbi Stern alerted Zachary Baker, who was then a librarian at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal (and now head librarian of the YIVO Institute in New York). According to a published report, Baker was "enormously excited" by what he saw, which he characterized as "undoubtedly the most valuable cache of Russian-Jewish genealogical material known to exist outside of the Soviet Union."

Among other purposes, the files had been gathered to help exempt Russian immigrants from military service during World War I. They contained birth, circumcision, marriage and death certificates, school and military records, extensive family trees, citizenship documents, even photographs. Bank records, papers pertaining to wills and estates, and much general correspondence further rounded out the collection.

Soon another perceived crisis would precipitate more quick action, this time on the part of the Jewish genealogical community in tandem with other groups. As the first winds of glasnost blew across Russia, the United States finally agreed to surrender the records.

But first a deal was made in which the Jewish Genealogical Society of Greater Washington (JGSGW) would index the 135,000-page collection and the Mormon Family History Library would microfilm it. Over a period of two years, all parties completed their parts of the bargain and the Russian consular records were returned to Moscow in 1988.

Microfilmed sets of these records (sometimes referred to as the LI-RA-MA collection) are available through the Mormon Library, the U.S. National Archives and the National Archives of Canada. Before attempting to navigate the microfilms, however, researchers should consult the Index and Catalogue to the Russian Consular Records, by Sallyann Sack and Suzan Wynne (Garland Publishing, 1987), available through Jewish genealogical societies and university libraries.

To my mind, Wynne, Sack and other JGSGW volunteers deserve immense credit for accomplishing this Herculean task in the brief period allotted. Why not check the index to see if members of your family are listed?

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Searching for the answers

By DR. ELLIOTT MALOMETT

Dear Sir,

Thank you for your recent inquiry regarding the upcoming High Holy Days.

You want to know why people who have palpably little Jewish involvement for the other 362 days of the year bother to attend synagogue services on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. On the other hand, you are puzzled by Jewish tradition, which places so much emphasis on these three days, as though God is unavailable on a cold despairing midnight in March. Sir, your questions are good ones.

You have searched for answers by listening to your rabbi's High Holy Day sermons. They fittingly allude to repentance, to self-improvement, to Jewish values and Jewish unity. They may also delve into support for Israel, and the ironically passionate financial plea – the Kol Nidre Bonds speech. (After all, why talk about God on the holiest night of the year when we can talk about money?). What you have heard much less about are the "ghostlier demarcations," the bare night of death.

And Rosh Hashanah is, on some fundamental level, about remembering that we are going to die. That real life is a transient dream. That one morning at 4 a.m. you will wake up in the darkness, listen to the breathing of those you love, and realize: "Me – this body, husband, son, friend, teacher, this laugh, this pride, this dreaming, this preening for others, this skin, this scent, this secret lust, this unconquered spirit, this shifting heart, this semblance of power, this face, this wallet stuffed with cards of identity and affluence, this seat at the dinner table – all will vanish."

We do not like to talk about this, because as a culture we shun feelings of intensity. We substitute ennui for grief, distraction for joy, religious posturing for an open and sharing quest for enlightenment.

But death consciousness is not a cause for paralyzing feelings of depression. Quite the opposite: In the great moments of religious history, it formed the powerful beginning of life change. It is what allowed the Buddha to break free of stultifying social expectations and seek real inner understanding.

And it is the knowledge of our mortality that propels the Jew on the Days of Awe to move beyond the harrowing cage of daily calculations, the utterly futile preoccupation with temporal successes and approval, and begin to hunger for the highest things.

Rabbi Israel Salanter, the great ethicist of the last century, writes that "our entire life is God's mercy; by miracles we stand, but miracles may not happen every day." On Yom Kippur, death is not just ruminated upon but enacted through the prohibitions against eating, drinking, bathing, sexual relations. The breeze of death, felt close to the skin, can shock us into appreciating the miracle that is life.

Of course, this is hardly an answer to your dilemmas. Why do people attend shul? Some want to, some have to, some feel compelled to, some do it for others, some pay homage to the past, some throw darts at the future. But I suspect that both for the fastidiously observant and for the Jewishly unconcerned, it is the faint – and growing ever fainter – whiff of gravity in the air that proves compelling in a way that is hard to fathom rationally.

Since, as Philip Larkin beautifully writes, "someone will be forever surprising/ a hunger in himself to be more serious,/ And gravitating with it to this ground."

Yours truly…

A delicate balance maintained

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you skim the Internet for articles about Chassidim, you notice a recurring theme. How can Chassidim benefit from some aspects of western society without sacrificing the cherished values that form the foundation of their community? Today, a look at that delicate balance.

In "The Hasidim's Unorthodox Dilemma," the Globe and Mail focuses on the Chassidim of Montreal [http://www.globeandmail.com/docs/archive/19980205/Compass/UCOMP.html].

According to the article, poverty and unemployment have forced the Chassidim to approach the local government for assistance. They want to develop community training programs that are appropriate for this community. One solution being explored is computers. "The discipline needed to devote several hours a day to talmudic studies shows chassidic men are avid students and quick learners…A computer-oriented career suits Chassidim well because they can work at home and accommodate all the demands of their religion."

How do you allow kids to get out of the city yet still inspire them with traditional chassidic values? Send them to Camp Shalva. The article Country Camp, City Rules [http://www.th-record.com/orthodox/country.htm] gives an interesting glimpse into how things are run at the Bobov chassidic overnight camp for boys. Purchased in the mid-1970s, the camp combines talmudic classes with sports, field trips and games. (For a peek at life back in the city, take a look at the Jewish Telegraphic Agency article on a visit to a Satmar school for girls in Brooklyn [http://www.jta.org/feb98/18-satm.htm].)

Several years ago, the Satmar community of Kiryas Joel, north of New York, was involved in a fascinating court case. The United States Supreme Court ruled that the New York State legislature had acted unconstitutionally in establishing a school district specifically to meet the needs of members of Satmar Chassidim. After the case, four lawyers with a very wide range of opinions were invited to comment on The Church-State Game: A Symposium of Kiryas Joel [http://leaderu.com/ftissues/ft9411/kiryas.html]. I highly recommend this thoughtful and thought-provoking Web site.

Menachem Daum comes from a chassidic family in Brooklyn; Oren Rudavsky from a secular Jewish home in Illinois. Together, they produced the documentary A Life Apart: Hasidism in America [http://pages.prodigy.com/sunstrike/film.htm]. The program was recently aired on PBS and the network has created a large site about the making of the film and Chassidim in America [http://www.pbs.org/alifeapart/]. The provocative discussion area focuses on Chassidism in general, the relation of Chassidim to other streams of Judaism and the role of women within the chassidic community [http://www.pbs.org/cgi-bin/netforum/alifeapart/a/1/].

And finally, there's the story of Shlomo Koenig, actually New Hempstead, N.Y., Deputy Shlomo Koenig [http://www.s-t.com/daily/02-97/02-17-97/b02li043.htm]. Like most Chassidim, Koenig wears a kippah, and has a beard and payot. But he also wears a police uniform and a badge, and he carries a gun. Koenig had originally acted as an unofficial liaison for Rockland County's large chassidic community because they were distrustful of the police. Then he was invited to apply for a job.

"I'm a Jew first, a police officer second," he says. "I still try to live on my own in my smaller world. I try to do my studying, my praying, the religious education of my kids. I also try to be a sheriff. I have to be able to work with society, and I try to do that."

The Balkanization of the Western Wall

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Since its liberation from Jordan in 1967, Jerusalem's Kotel Ma'aravi, or Western Wall, has been a spiritual magnet for Jews of all denominations and beliefs.

While no one monitors which prayer books visitors use at the site or if head coverings are worn, the essential layout of the prayer area there reflects the requirements of Halachah, or Jewish religious law: men on one side of a partition, women on the other. Public services at the holy site have likewise been conducted in accordance with classical Jewish tradition.

Over the past year, though, egalitarian prayer-gatherings at the Kotel have been organized by non-Orthodox Jewish activists, predictably provoking hurt and anger (even, inexcusably, some violence) among the thousands of traditional Jews present on those occasions and – likewise predictably – a good deal of fawning by much of the press. In concert with the activists, non-Orthodox Jewish leaders are demanding that a portion of the Wall be designated for their constituents' own use.

Critics of the non-traditional prayer groups regard them as essentially political manoeuvres, the opening of new fronts in the American non-Orthodox leaders' war against Israel's "religious status quo." (Indeed, last year, an organizer of a mixed-gender Kotel prayer group inadvertently referred to the gathering as a "rally.")

They point out, moreover, that the vast majority of the Wall's regular visitors are Orthodox Jews. And that whatever one may personally think of mixed-gender services and chanting women, such things offend the Orthodox. Sensitive folk of goodwill, after all, would never think of entering a mosque with shoes on, or a closed space with a lit cigarette.

The critics note, further, that there is no rule in the Reform or Conservative codes forbidding men and women from praying separately, as Jews have done for thousands of years. So why not continue to accommodate the "highest common denominator" standard of Halachah at the holiest Jewish prayer site?

They note, too, that there is no limit to what could legitimately be demanded were Jewish religious law abandoned as the public norm at the Kotel. Why wouldn't "Messianic Jews" assert their right to mount crosses for their services at the Wall? Might not anti-Zionist Jews wish to burn Israeli flags there?

To this Jew, though, those points, while absolutely valid, pale entirely beside the most devastating one of all.

For while the non-Orthodox activists' immediate goal to gain a "piece of the Kotel" may seem at first glance reasonable enough, a second, more thoughtful look shows a true Jewish tragedy in the making.

Because for more than three decades, the Kotel has been a place – perhaps the only one in the world – where Jews of all affiliations and persuasions have regularly prayed side by side.

Imagine, though, the realization of the activists' goal – a "balkanized" Kotel, Orthodox Jews here, non-Orthodox there, never the twain to meet, or at least to stand together in prayer.

Could any truly caring Jew – of whatever prefix – really want to hammer that horrid, heavy nail into the coffin of Jewish unity?

Rabbi Shafran is the director of public affairs for Agudath Israel of America.

Law student to help oversee Toronto police force

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A chance sighting of a newspaper ad has led to Sandy Adelson's becoming the youngest person ever to serve as a member of the Toronto Police Services Board.

The 22-year-old York University law student applied for the position earlier this year after spotting an ad in the North York Mirror.

She was initially rejected by city council because some councillors were concerned about her youth and lack of experience. After the council's nominating committee reconvened and continued to back her as the best candidate for the position, she was sworn in at the end of August as a member of the seven-person civilian board that oversees Toronto's police service.

Adelson, who was born in Johannesburg and moved here at age two, has wanted to pursue a career in criminal law for a long time. She entered law school a year ago after studying philosophy for two years at McMaster, where she made the dean's list. A graduate of North Toronto Collegiate Institute, she graduated at the top of her high school class with a 97.7 average.

Although Adelson has always followed police stories in the news, she didn't realize until this year she'd have an opportunity to be involved in such a direct way. "This is a place your input is translated into action...I think that's very exciting."

Her term runs until November 2000, and she has been told it involves about 30 hours a month of work, including preparation for meetings.

After returning from a working holiday tending bar in London, England, earlier this summer,

Sandy Adelson

Adelson set about studying agendas, minutes and reports in preparation for her first board meeting.

She believes all the members bring something different to the board, and that her age is an asset.

"Toronto is close to my heart. I'm committed to what happens here. I'm young. This is the city I'll be growing up and raising my family in."

She hopes to go on police ride-alongs to better understand and "talk about with intelligence" the role of police officers and the reality of their lives.

"I think there's a lot more fear and distrust [of police] on the minds of youth right now. I think it's important that young people are taught at an early age to respect the police but also...making sure at the same time that there are checks and balances on the police and that their work is always monitored, and making sure there isn't misconduct on the force...I think respect has to be earned."

She has stated her intention to voice strong opinions on an issue-by-issue basis.

Among her goals is to help improve relations between the community and the service, in part by talking to young people.

Artist explores socially conscious themes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto-born artist Ellen Simon has used her talent to create socially conscious works on ecumenical and peace themes.

Simon, who lives in New York City but returns to Canada frequently to visit and to work on her art, was honored this year when the Canadian government selected her design for the 52 cent stamp. Simon designed and cartooned the stained glass window from which the stamp was created.

In an interview in Toronto, the octogenarian explained that after graduating from Jarvis Collegiate and studying at the Ontario College of Art, she moved to New York when she realized that "to be Jewish and female in Toronto at that time was so limiting. So I followed my sister Margaret, also an artist, to New York."

Her first major assignment, she says, "came as a fluke." She was asked by the architect of the Holy Blossom Temple if she would design and cartoon the stained glass windows. She jumped at the opportunity and Yvonne Williams was chosen to execute Simon's design. The two have collaborated on many other windows over the years.

Although Simon has worked with woodblocks, pencil drawings, lithographs and water colors, she says the Holy Blossom windows "hooked me on stained glass when I discovered that this was a beautiful medium."

In New York, Simon studied and later practised art therapy, working with disturbed children, and she lectured and presented therapy workshops in New York and Toronto, at centres including the New York State Psychiatric Hospital, Harlem Hospital Centre, St. Mary's Hospital for Children in Bayside, N.Y., and many others.

Her early career included writing and illustrating children's books, among them The Critter Book, which was selected as the Children's Book of the Year in 1940.

Simon's stained glass pieces have been featured at Georg Jensen in New York, in shops throughout the United States and at Trade Winds in Toronto.

Her extensive list of accomplishments includes magazine illustrations, posters, greeting cards, banners and illustrations for numerous charitable organizations.

Her stained glass windows can be seen in the Princeton University Chapel, Notre Dame Chapel, Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, Temple Emanuel, Temple Shaar Hashomayim in Windsor and in many private collections. Her works are in the permanent collections of the National Gallery of Canada, New York Public Library and the Brooklyn Museum.

Simon returns to Canada every summer (she still drives back and forth), to draw and paint at Georgian Bay.

"Working there is the crown of the year for me," she said. She is an avid hiker and volunteers her time to working in art therapy.

Simon will present a retrospective of her works of the 1930s and 1940s including those on the Holocaust at D & E Lake Ltd., 239 King St. E. in February 1999.

Country Shul welcomes new rabbi

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

RICHMOND HILL — City-slickers may think of it as nosebleed country, but for Rabbi Ezriel Sitzer, the Country Shul is a perfect fit.

Rabbi Sitzer, a Toronto native, is the new spiritual leader of the Country Shul, situated for the past nine years in the Bathurst Glen Plaza, on Bathurst Street north of Highway 7, in the heart of York Region's suburbs.

"No, we're not out in the country," smiles Rabbi Sitzer, a 38-year-old father of three. "We're not in the city, but we're not that far either."

Its name may evoke bucolic images, but the 40-family synagogue will likely find itself in the middle of what planners say will be a huge Jewish boom in York Region.

The region's Jewish population is currently estimated at 50,000, concentrated mainly in Thornhill. But planners with UJA/Federation project the number of Jews in the region will mushroom to 75,000 within a decade, with the next growth area to be around Bathurst between Highway 7 and Major Mackenzie Drive – right in the Country Shul's range.

"The potential here is terrific. We're looking to emulate what has taken place in Thornhill," says Rabbi Sitzer, who assumes his duties after 18 years of yeshivah study in Israel and New York.

The rabbi and his family arrived just weeks ago from Jerusalem, where he had been teaching at two yeshivot.

He had been offered positions in other cities, including Sao Paulo and Cape Town, but chose his native Toronto. "Once you travel around, you appreciate how wonderful the Jewish community and the amenities are here," he says. Plus, he adds, his parents and siblings live here.

The rabbi, who studied math and computer science at the University of Western Ontario, calls his congregation "user-friendly."

"We're really trying to create a non-threatening, loving and warm environment," he says. The shul's unofficial "three-to-five-year plan" includes classes for beginners, Shabbatons, daily minyanim and ultimately, a free-standing building, probably in a development on the west side of Bathurst.

His official welcoming, he points out, was this past Shabbat, when the parshah was Ki Tetze, which means, "When you will go out."

The following Shabbat's parshah is Ki Tavo, which means, "When you will arrive."

"I've gone out and arrived," says Rabbi Sitzer with a smile.

Rabbi takes Reconstructionist job

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

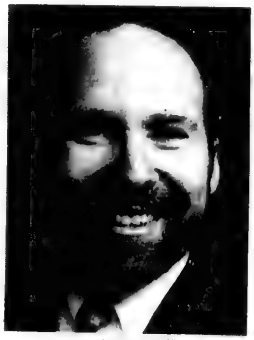
TORONTO — Rabbi Shawn Zevit chuckles when it's suggested that he's something of a Renaissance man.

"I see the 21st century as being about that," he says in a phone interview from Philadelphia. "That's the way of the future…to diversify – incorporating religion with culture and the arts."

He ought to know. Apart from his ordination this past summer from the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College outside Philadelphia, Rabbi Zevit is an accomplished musician, theatre artist, communications facilitator and all-round spiritual person.

Born in Winnipeg and raised in Toronto, the 38-year-old rabbi was recently named director of outreach and community development for North America's Reconstructionist movement, encompassing about 100 congregations

He points out that number is up from the roughly 60 Reconstructionist synagogues and chaverot that existed when he began his rabbinic studies five years ago, indicating that Reconstructionism – Judaism's so-called fourth stream – is catching on.



Rabbi Shawn Zevit

It will now be his job to keep that momentum going. Apart from beating the bushes for new adherents, Rabbi Zevit will be looking after training and leadership development for lay people and rabbis in the movement.

In between, he'll continue to indulge his passion for theatre and music. He works with Playback Philadelphia, a local stage troupe. His band, Shabbat Unplugged, has been touring in and around Philadelphia. He hosts a weekly radio show called Heart, Mind and Spirit. And this past May, Rabbi Zevit released Heart and Soul, a CD of 14 original tracks that, he says, draw on his own spiritual development.

The skills are diverse alright, but how does he plan to apply them to rabbinics?

"To me, rabbi is a verb," he responds. "It's supposed to bring holiness and wholeness, and expose people to creative Judaism."

What's creative Judaism? "A balance of the traditional and the innovative." That's what drew him to Reconstructionism in the first place: "It was an attraction to the more intimate. [The movement] values tradition but seeks to reconstruct Judaism to include culture and values."

Many Jews, he adds, "are on a faith quest. They're looking around, asking questions like everyone else."

After graduating from York University's theatre program in 1982, Rabbi Zevit began his own spiritual odyssey. He worked for the following decade in educational theatre, staging short plays at schools and workplaces.

That led to a career heading his own communications consulting firm in Toronto, teaching the art of clear and effective communication to businesses and individuals. He also led services at Kehilat Ahavat Chesed in Toronto, an egalitarian congregation. But becoming a rabbi wasn't on his mind, yet.

Five years ago, he visited Philadelphia to direct a play, and decided the Reconstructionist College was for him. He's never looked back. And he hasn't given up on good communications; he teaches the subject at Temple University.

So apart from "rabbi-ing," as he puts it, the rabbi sings, acts, teaches and preaches.

"It's exciting for me, " he says, "to have these skills and to be able to weave them together."

Abella named to Shiff Chair

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Sept. 14, Irving Abella ushers in a new era in academia when he delivers the inaugural lecture for the newly established J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry.

Held by Abella, the chair is affiliated with York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. It is the first permanent chair in this field at any institution of higher learning in Canada.

Its establishment, Abella observed, is proof that Canadian Jewish studies have come of age. As he put it: "A decade ago, no one would have thought it academically viable or useful."

That this is no longer the case is due in no small part to Abella himself. In 1982, to much acclaim, he and Harold Troper published None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948. It was an instant classic that strikingly underlined the paucity of such books on Canadian Jewry.

In a related impact, None Is Too Many, which has sold a phenomenal 50,000-plus copies and gone through four printings, turned a generation of scholars toward Jewish studies.

Abella himself was galvanized by None Is Too Many, which, he regrets, has yet to be issued in French for the Quebec market. Since its appearance, he has written A Coat of Many Colors: Two Hundred Years of Jewish Life in Canada and Growing Up Jewish in Canada.

And now, Abella, 58, is researching and writing two additional books. The first, concerning Nazi war criminals in Canada, will be out within a year. The second, on Jewish immigration to Canada, will hit book shops in about two years.

Abella's credentials as a scholar account for the fact that he was selected as the occupant of the J. Richard Shiff Chair, whose benefactor is a Toronto real estate developer.

A Torontonian whose parents were Polish Jews, Abella will be expected to work toward the achievement of two broad objectives: to promote and encourage research on a wide variety of topics relating to the growth, development and future of the Jewish community in Canada, and to stimulate interest in the study of Canadian Jewry at York University and other institutions in Canada.

He will do this through the medium of seminars, conferences, guest lectures and community outreach.

"We have a wonderful, tumultuous history in Canada, and not too many people know about it," said Abella, the first Jewish president-elect of the 80-year-old Canadian Historical Association. "Jews are not newcomers to Canada, and we should stop behaving as if we were."

Citing examples, Abella pointed out that Jewish settlers and fur traders beat the English to Upper Canada; that Victoria was the first city in British North America to have a Jewish mayor; and that the first synagogue in Canada was founded in Montreal more than 200 years ago.

As part of his new duties, Abella, whose normal teaching load includes courses on Canadian labor and immigration history, will give the first university-level undergraduate course in Canadian Jewish history.

Irving Abella

Looking ahead to 1999, he plans to prepare undergraduate courses on Canada and Israel, racism and anti-Semitism, and Canada and the Holocaust.

Abella, who holds three degrees from the University of Toronto, is the only child of the late Louis and Esther, who arrived separately in Canada in the 1920s. A trade unionist and a labor Zionist, Louis opened a tiny dairy restaurant in the garment district, and the family lived in the apartment above it.

As a boy, Abella attended the Toronto Hebrew Day School (now known as the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto). He spent summers at Camp Kvutza, near Dunnville, Ont., where he met his first Israeli and learned Hebrew folk songs. He recalls his boyhood in a nostalgic essay in a forthcoming commemorative volume entitled Canada and Israel.

Abella remembers his elation when the United Nations partitioned Palestine into Jewish and Arab states in 1947. By the same token, he has not forgotten the endemic anti-Semitism which prevailed in Toronto in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

As a student, he gravitated toward history, captivated by his father's stories and convinced that he was living in an important historical era.

At the University of Toronto, he was drawn to labor history, a topic he has addressed in several books (Nationalism, Communism and Canadian Labor and On Strike: Six Major Industrial Disputes in Canadian History) and countless monographs.

In 1966, when he thought of writing his doctorate on a Canadian Jewish subject, he was politely discouraged, told that there was no one in the department qualified to direct him.

Two years later, following a stint as a researcher for the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, York University's Glendon College hired him as a lecturer. His link with Glendon College remains undimmed.

Abella's formal association with the Jewish community began in 1980, when he chaired the Canadian Jewish Congress' archives. In 1984, he was elected chair of the now-defunct Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East.

From 1992 to 1995, he was national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, the second academic after Irwin Cotler to assume that position. During his term of office, he led the first mission of Canadian university presidents to Israel, a development which contributed to the advent of Jewish studies programs in Canada and fostered exchanges between Canadian and Israeli universities.

During the Abella administration, Congress became far more deeply involved in Canadian affairs, including the incendiary war criminal issue.

Abella, who has been chair of Congress' war crimes committee since 1995, is critical of the way in which Canada has handled this file.

Until 1986, the federal government lacked the political will to root out Nazi war criminals, evincing no political benefit in prosecuting them. Despite the formation of the Deschenes Commission, the period from 1986 to 1995 was characterized by bureaucratic indifference.

Since then, judicial apathy has been the order of the day, though Abella welcomes Ottawa's recent decision to step up the hunt for war criminals.

Abella, whose wife Rosalie sits as a judge on the Ontario Court of Appeals and whose two grown boys (Jacob and Zachary) are students, believes that the major challenge facing Jews in Canada today is whether they can transmit Jewish values to the next generation.

"Can we be as strong in the 21st century ate we are in the 20th century?"

In closing, he said: "We should worry more about the rates of assimilation and intermarriage than about anti-Semitism, which is well reduced and nowhere near the levels of my youth."

Lodzer Centre gets a new spiritual leader

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Ronnie Cahana

TORONTO — The Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation has a new spiritual leader. Rabbi Ronnie Cahana moved here in late August from Gothenberg, Sweden, where he was a congregational rabbi at a Conservative synagogue for the past five years.

In Gothenberg he followed in the footsteps of his father, Rabbi Moshe Cahana, a seventh-generation Israeli rabbi who was sent in 1950 by the Jewish Agency to serve a community of Holocaust survivors in Borås, about 40 kilometres from Gothenberg. His wife, a Hungarian survivor who had found refuge in Gothenberg before moving to Israel, encouraged him to accept the post.

The younger Rabbi Cahana was born in 1953 and the family stayed in Sweden until he was three years old. After a time in the New York area, they settled in Texas, where Rabbi Moshe Cahana is rabbi emeritus at a Conservative synagogue in Houston.

Initially Rabbi Ronnie Cahana resisted becoming a rabbi. He has a degree in philosophy from the University of Texas, and has also studied poetry.

Eventually he decided the rabbinate was his calling too. He believes his greatest privilege as a rabbi is being involved with families at life cycle events. The role of a rabbi, he said, is to "help people translate the holy into our daily reality, and to find within the holiness, our day-to-day [reality]."

His brother also followed family tradition and is a rabbi in Rhode Island.

Rabbi Cahana was ordained from the Academy for Jewish Religion, a pluralistic institution in New York, and is a member of the Rabbinical Assembly, the umbrella for Conservative rabbis. He also studied at yeshiva in Israel and did post-graduate work in Philosophy, Poetry and Jewish Ethics at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The Lodzer synagogue is not currently affiliated with any denominational movement. Their services are traditional Conservative in format.

"Everybody's welcome," said the new rabbi, who is replacing Rabbi Louis Schecter on the latter's retirement.

"I believe in multi-denominational religion. When we start dividing and saying what you're not, we forget to say what we are."

Returning to Sweden was a profound experience for the rabbi. In fact he buried his sandek, the man who was given the honor of holding him at his brit milah.

Rabbi Cahana co-founded the Nordic Centre for Inter-Religious Dialogue to focus on religious conflict resolution. He travelled with a Syrian-born imam and a Swedish priest to war-torn Bosnia to comfort the people of Sarajevo and meet with local leadership. There, prior to Rosh Hashanah, he blew the shofar in a number of locations. The three of them also travelled throughout Sweden to engage in dialogue about cooperation, celebration and their respective religions.

With his wife Karen, an American-born family therapist, he has travelled to the former Soviet Union and Latin American to teach and offer assistance to Jews there.

The Cahanas, who have five children ranging in age from one to 11, are no strangers to the Canadian Jewish community. They spent five years in Vancouver when Rabbi Cahana served as assistant rabbi at Congregation Beth Israel prior to returning to Sweden.

In joining the Lodzer shul, Rabbi Cahana is completing another cycle in his life. "In the community where I was born, 90 percent were from Lodz. These are my people."

The 250-family Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation traces its roots back to 1953, when a Mutual Benefit Society was established for families from Lodz who had recently arrived in Toronto. The synagogue is located on Heaton Street on land purchased in 1966.

Rabbi Cahana believes it's important for Jews to "know how to appreciate what a treasure we have [in Judaism]. Judaism is the most beautiful, poetic expression of how to live with God's presence." The Jews of Lodz, he said, represented European Jewry at its most magnificent.

Temple Kol Ami celebrating 10th anniversary

Planning underway for new building in Thornhill

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Starting with a small nucleus of 17 families who met in people's homes for Shabbat services, Temple Kol Ami is now celebrating its 10th anniversary with a membership of 240 families.

The temple holds its services and its classes on Hebrew and Judaic studies at Leo Baeck Day School on Atkinson Avenue.

According to president Karen Paikin, however, the Reform congregation, growing at the rate of 15 to 20 percent a year, hopes to have its own building in Thornhill in a few years. In this way, it hopes to keep up with the burgeoning Jewish population.

"We are already underway with our fundraising for the new building," she said.

The first event in its year-long celebration was a pot luck dinner Sept. 5, followed by a picnic lunch, family programs and barbecue dinner the next day in Thornhill Park.

The program at the pot luck dinner included Havdalah with Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb and special guests Rabbis Nancy and David Wechsler-Azen. Rabbi Nancy Wechsler-Azen, Temple Kol Ami's first permanent rabbi, was appointed two years after the temple was founded.

Rabbi Gottlieb was one of the temple's first temporary leaders, when it was meeting in private homes.

With 250 students attending classes twice a week, the school covers junior kindergarten to confirmation (Grade 10).

Holiday programs available for students living away from home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish students who've travelled far from home to attend university in places like Montreal – or smaller centres – needn't feel isolated over the upcoming holidays.

Holiday-related campus programs can provide food for thought, food for the soul and sometimes just food. With the help of the local Hillel or Jewish student organization, students can generally arrange to attend services and often to receive home hospitality for meals.

This year for the first time Montreal's Hillel Jewish Student Centre, serving all campuses in the Montreal area, will hold High Holy Day services, to be led by a student rabbi from the Jewish Theological Seminary. Rosh Hashanah dinners, a pre-fast and a break-fast meal are also on the agenda. (The break-fast is free; Rosh Hashanah and the pre-fast dinners are $12 and $10 respectively.)

At McGill University, there will be tables where students can sample apples and honey, make necklaces from honey-sweetened or apple-flavored cereals or make Rosh Hashanah cards, said Beth Ackerman, Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow at Hillel Montreal. She will also be supplying Rosh Hashanah bags with apples and honey to out-of-town Jewish students living in residence.

For Sukkot, Montreal students are invited to a "lulav luau," complete with music, pina coladas and leis, in Hillel's sukkah.

Elsewhere in Canada...

• Halifax students can have home hospitality, a Rosh Hashanah "apples and honey" kit, and a student break-fast following Yom Kippur services. The Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation serves about 375 students at 14 campuses across the Atlantic provinces, and can be reached at 902-422-7491 or by e-mail [ai993@chebucto.ns.ca].

• Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto will be giving out honey candies and/or apples and honey at York, the University of Toronto and Ryerson Polytechnic University.

• York University is having an environmental Tashlich service.

• At York on Oct. 29 and at U of T on Oct. 24, Ethiopian-born rabbinical student Yefet Alemu will talk about Rosh Hashanah in Ethiopia.

• Also in Toronto, Kedma, the Orthodox Zionist student group, will sponsor a two-part program on Sept. 24 and Sept. 27 on "the enigmatic questions of life."

Free synagogue tickets in Vancouver

• In Vancouver, free synagogue tickets are available to Jewish students. There will be a second night Rosh Hashanah dinner at Hillel House.

• In Edmonton, the JSA/Hillel arranges dinners and free synagogue tickets. "We make sure [students] have a way to get there and are all taken care of," said Alissia Oshry, JSA/Hillel director.

Programs in the United States have included the following:

• The University of California at San Diego's "Alternative Rosh Hashanah." Instead of traditional services, students participated in High Holy Day workshops that related to Jewish themes such as environmentalism, feminism, tshuvah or meditation.

• Brown University's apples-and-honey party after Rosh Hashanah Services. The program was designed to provide students a place to socialize after services end and to allow students who did not attend services a chance to participate in a Jewish activity during the High Holy Days.

• Indiana University's "Send a Card Around the World" program. Tables were set up in dorms for students to send Rosh Hashanah cards to small Jewish communities in Africa, Asia or South America. The Hillel campus fellow there went around campus dressed up as Winnie-the-Pooh, distributing honey to students.

Hillel's Jewish Campus Service Corps, which is behind a number of the above programs, was founded four years ago to promote Jewish life on campus.

Laval U., CJC to meet over controversial Master's thesis

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Laval University will meet with officials from Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), this month to seek some common ground over an approved Master's thesis that's been accused of being sympathetic to the Nazi regime.

Since news of the thesis, by graduate political science student Pierre Asselin, first broke publicly July 20 and in the wake of a recent editorial by La Presse journalist Agnès Gruda, the controversy has seemed to have taken on a life of its own in the Quebec media and in the provincial capital over issues of academic freedom and ethics.

In an apparent effort to control its level of embarrassment and the damage to its reputation, Laval University, responding to a letter CJC-Q had sent it on Aug. 5, agreed to meet.

"The objective will be to develop a mechanism where this won't happen again," CJC-Q chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard said in an interview.

She said CJC-Q would be seeking to have the university maintain its "ethical standards."

Laval University was "asleep at the wheel," she said. Now it is looking to "find a way out."

She said, however, that it was not CJC-Q's role to "determine" the actual worthiness of a Asselin's thesis, but to ensure the university "acts in a responsible manner" in the future.

Apparently out of concern over how some of Asselin's positions would be perceived, he was ordered by university officals, in order to have the thesis approved, to add a paragraph in the thesis' foreward deploring the Holocaust.

Still, some of his conclusions in the thesis, which compared nationalist movements in Quebec and Nazi Germany during the 1930s, included that exterminating European Jewry was not an integral part of National Socialism and that the Allies, and not Adolf Hitler, were mainly responsible for World War II.

Gruda, in her highly critical editorial, cited some others:

Among them were that Hitler didn't seriously persecute the Jews during the 1930s, that Kristallnacht was mainly caused by the assassination of a German diplomat in Paris, and that Hitler helped Jews leave Germany.

Although the university's letter to CJC-Q left open the possibility that Asselin might be instructed to make further changes, it remained unclear – with the thesis approved – the extent to which they could do so. Zalcman Howard conceded that such changes would be "unusual" under such circumstances.

Moreover, it seemed unlikely that a chartered university could revoke the thesis even if it wanted to, since Asselin is in legal control of his work.

In a similar controversial case in France some years ago, a student had his thesis revoked, but universities in France are controlled by the state.

Although Asselin has requested to meet with CJC-Q, Zalcman Howard said this would not even be considered until after the meeting with Laval University officials.

One more concern she indicated would be raised during their meeting is that Asselin's Master's degree will allow him to teach at Quebec CEGEPs.

"A degree such as this confers a certain legitimacy and notion of scholarship," she said. "That poses a certain danger and should be taken into account when granting degrees."

'Internal matter'

The merits of a thesis itself are an "internal matter" for the university to decide, she said.

The university's letter to CJC-Q, written by rector François Tavernas, said the thesis is being reassessed closely to ensure that "all the relevent rules...were followed."

Still, there did not yet appear to be any indication that Asselin's actual methodology was being called into question. Initially, in fact, when the thesis was published, his research and methodology were being praised even by university officials who took issue with some of his conclusions.

Yet, according to one knowledgeable source who examined closely Asselin's source material, he did not make use of even the most basic Holocaust research texts published in French, including that of Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg, leaving the impression that Asselin may have deliberately ignored them to put forward his own agenda.

Landry's 'ethnic' remarks draw Jewish community's ire

MONTREAL — Deputy Premier Bernard Landry drew sharp criticism from the Jewish community for suggesting that a greater than 50-percent-plus-one vote majority to win a referendum would be giving "a veto" to the "cultural communities" over separation because of their bloc No vote.

The coalition of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC–Q), the Hellenic Congress of Quebec and the National Congress of Italian-Canadians, Quebec region, issued a joint statement condemning the remarks.

"As deputy premier of Quebec, he should be among the first to recognize that all votes are equal, regardless of the origin of the voter. Mr. Landry's comments contradict one of the most fundamental democratic principles by discriminating between two groups of citizens," said CJC-Q chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard.

Bernard Landry

CJC-Q vice-chair Max Bernard added: "It is high time that leaders tell the population, in no uncertain terms, that each and every Quebecer has the right to express himself or herself freely and legally on all political and social issues."

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) vice-president Steve Slimovitch suggested that if an American vice-president, for example, made a similar remark, he would be forced to resign within hours.

BBC praised Premier Lucien Bouchard for distancing himself from Landry's remarks but felt that he did not go far enough in publicly castigating his deputy.

'Lead by example'

"With Jacques Parizeau gone, it is now time for Premier Bouchard to purge his house of all xenophobes. It is time for the premier to lead by example and demote Mr. Landry. There is simply no place in Quebec political discourse for the 'us versus them' mentally," said Slimovitch.

In an unusual move, the Board of Jewish Ministers of Greater Montreal, whose members cross the denominational spectrum, issued a public statement "deploring" the remarks.

"Mr. Landry continues to create artificial divisions in Quebec society, fabricating tensions to try to benefit his cause. Despite the secrecy of the ballot, Mr. Landry labels and evaluates votes, denying the equality of every Quebecer to form part of a clear majority in case of a referendum on secession.

"Jewish citizens of Quebec find Mr. Landry's words particularly repugnant because, since the days of Jeremiah the prophet, we have prayed for the welfare of the community where we live and are required by our tradition to participate and contribute fully to society."

Oberlander linked to notorious SS killing squad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

KITCHENER, Ont. — In a two-pronged attack by federal lawyers last week, alleged Nazi war criminal Helmut Oberlander was linked to a notorious SS killing squad – both in an eyewitness account and through wartime documents.

The eyewitness account was offered by Nikolai Sidorenko, a Soviet POW who joined Einsatzkommando 10A. He testified in Federal Court that the unit included five or six interpreters and "Oberlander was one of the interpreters."

Sidorenko said he identified a wartime photograph of Oberlander from a photo-spread presented to him by Canadian investigators in 1994.

Oberlander is facing loss of his Canadian citizenship and deportation for allegedly misrepresenting his wartime activities. Government authorities claim he would never have been allowed into Canada had he truthfully divulged his wartime service to immigration officials.

Sidorenko, who was flown to Canada from his home in Donetsk, Ukraine, also described a life and death incident involving Oberlander.

He and his friend were doing guard duty at a base in Novorossijk on the Black Sea when his friend saw a woman being escorted into a building for interrogation.

"My friend saw that woman and he said he knew [her], that she was a janitor at the school and we should go in and clarify that she wasn't Jewish," Sidorenko said. "He was concerned that she might be shot."

Oberlander was among the Germans preparing for the interrogation, he added.

Sidorenko, 81, testified that he saw notices calling for the Jews of Novorossijk to gather to be "resettled." One day, he said, "they were put on vehicles and taken away," though he said he did not know their fate.

The unit frequently went on anti-partisan missions during which interpreters carried pistols and submachine-guns. "I remember that in one of the villages…they gathered people and those 40 or 50 people were shot…After that they were thrown into a well."

Sidorenko, who served eight years in Soviet prison for treason after the war, said he did not know if Oberlander was present during that raid.

Several wartime documents concerning Oberlander's 1944 application for German citizenship were presented to the court, though defence lawyer Eric Hafemann disputed their admissibility.

One of the documents was dated Feb. 18, 1944. It is a letter from the SS and Police Leader in the Lublin District and it recommends 16 men for German citizenship. The men were serving at "a field postal unit [and] have been deployed as ethnic Germans in the SD (the SS security service) unit for more than two years and have proven to be very capable," the document stated. Oberlander was one of those named.

A document from the central immigration office of the chief of the Security Police and SD attests to Oberlander's military service and refers to his unit by its military police number. Under questioning by lawyer Robert Goldstein, David Marwell, former chief of investigations for the U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI), testified that he checked U.S. archives and determined the unit was part of Einsatzkommando 6. An earlier witness, Manfred Messerschmidt, an expert on German military history, testified that members of Einsatzkommando 10A may have joined that unit later in the war.

Another wartime document, which originated in a German immigration office known by its acronym EWZ, also identified Oberlander by the same field unit number. A third document from EWZ, described Oberlander as a "student, SS-Mann [man] and interpreter."

Helmut Oberlander, in World War II uniform

Meanwhile, an April 6, 1944 document that attested to Oberlander's racial purity referred to his military service. The translator's note suggests that could mean the German Armed Forces. Another document, dated March 31, 1944, prepared by the mayor of the city of Gnesen, contains Oberlander's naturalization file and describes him as a member of the Wehrmacht, the German armed forces.

Hafemann said Oberlander will testify that he served in the German army, not the SD. In addition, Hafemann said he would challenge the admissibility of all wartime documents on the basis that they are hearsay and not admissible.

Crown lawyer Peter Vita said the material is admissible as business documents. The court has yet to rule on that point.

In earlier testimony, Messerschmidt stated that Oberlander received a service medal "with swords" in January 1943, a few months after Einsatzkommando 10A joined a larger army group in anti-partisan warfare.

"In actions of this kind, prisoners were taken and they were interrogated." After being questioned, "they were mostly shot," Messerschmidt said.

The hearing is scheduled to continue this week in Vancouver, when a former Einsatzkommando driver is expected to testify. The court returns to Kitchener next week when Oberlander and his wife Margret will testify.

There is a world of difference between "life goes on" and "life is good."

When people age, or become ill, or suffer a trauma, they don't suddenly give up who they are to take on a new identity called 'patient' or 'client'. They remain themselves, with deeply rooted values, traditions, and needs.

That's why at circle of care, we pay attention to what makes each person unique. Our home care options take into account lifestyle, family and community. We are sensitive to and respect each person's religion, culture, language, and background.

At circle of care, we recognize that circumstances can threaten a person's vitality, their capacity to function independently, and their ability to participate in family and community life. So we offer choices in home care to meet those needs. As a result, many of our programs create the means that can make life special again.

MONTREAL — The world is still a scary place as far as Jews are concerned, says Abe Foxman, a man who has spent his adult life fighting anti-Semitism with the New York-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

"After all the revolutions, after many of the isms – communism, fascism – have gone and passed, anti-Semitism remains resilient," he said.

Foxman, national director of the ADL, was in Montreal as guest speaker for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research's (CIJR) annual fundraiser, probably the first time, he noted, he has helped make a pitch for another organization.

"Anti-Semitism is not an exact science; it's not susceptible to being measured or calibrated, but the short answer is: Yes, there is still anti-Semitism and it is everywhere.

"Albert Einstein called anti-Semitism 'the shadow of the Jewish people,' but he missed the point a bit. You don't need to have Jews to have anti-Semitism," Foxman said.

The Internet has globalized anti-Semitism, he said. "At one time, if you wanted hate you had to go find it. Now it comes right into your home."

Since the fall of communism in eastern Europe, "every election has had its Jewish coefficient. Who is Jewish, who had a Jewish grandmother? And not too many say it doesn't matter," he said.

Currency crises from Malaysia to Italy to Mexico have been blamed on the Jews, he said. In the United States, extreme right-wing militias propagate conspiracy theories about Jews and even in the Quebec nationalist movement surveys show "a serious anti-Semitic element" in the sense that people perceive Jews as having too much power.

Surveys

When later questioned, however, Foxman could not remember what surveys he was referring to and had no more precise information.

"The point is no community is immune, especially where there is social unrest. Anti-Semitism is used to plug in to other hatreds," he said.

The event, held at the home of Evelyn and Raphael Schachter, was also a celebration of the CIJR's 10th anniversary and a tribute to its founder-director, Frederick Krantz.

Special guest was Martin Cauchon, MP for Outremont and secretary of state for economic development. Congratulatory messages were received from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who praised the CIJR as "an excellent example of what can be done to present Israel's case," and from Labor party leader Ehud Barak, who underscored its role in disseminating information on the Middle East and cultivating student leadership.

Harold Waller, a fellow professor, said Krantz has "worked indefatigably since calling together a small group of beleaguered academics in the beginning months of the intifadah to disseminate the truth at a time when there was much distortion in the media," building it into the multi-faceted institution it is today.

Krantz said the strength of CIJR is that it brings together "disparate people, often with different political views, who because of their shared love of Israel and Yiddishkeit, have become a model for the Diaspora in their ability to concentrate on what binds them. Yet, we are not afraid of debate or criticism."

The CIJR operates on an $80,000 a year budget, with two staff members, student interns and volunteers. Its senior staff member, Karen Lazar, will be leaving shortly to go to Boston where she will work in public affairs at the Israeli Consulate. Yitzhak Levanon, former consul general in Montreal, now holds that post in Boston.

Joe Miller's $34,000 donation led the evening's pledges. A $6,400 grant from Charles Bronfman's CRB Foundation to the new Frederick Krantz Scholarship Fund was also announced.

Campus construction faces delay

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Construction on the Jewish Community Campus, originally envisioned to begin this past spring, could be delayed for up to one year because the YM-YWHA and FEDERATION CJA are determined not to incur cost overruns.

The approximately $25-million project, which will expand, renovate and integrate the Y and Cummings House, has been described as the largest-ever capital undertaking in the Montreal Jewish community.

The Y, which forms the south side of the campus, has decided to put out a second call for tenders after the initial round did not produce a bid the Y was prepared to accept.

Campaign chair Gary Shapiro said the Quebec bid depository system requires a delay of six months before going to re-tender. The first call was made in June, which would mean December is the earliest the Y could try again. "We'll probably go to tender again in the new year, which means we could be in the ground by early spring," he said.

Tenders are expected to be called for the first time for work on the north campus at the end of October, said FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick.

Both sections of the project, it is anticipated, will take 18 months each to complete. Most of the money is being raised from prominent individuals in the Jewish community.

A total of $3.9 million has also been promised from government. The federal government has just informed the community that it will contribute $1.3 million through its infrastructure program, matching an earlier grant made by the Quebec government. The City of Montreal has also offered $1.3 million in "indirect" support, half for landscaping in the area and the other half, payable over 20 years, for community services.

"If we find a price we can afford, we could start construction in January. If it's too high or we have to modify our plans, obviously there'll be a further delay," Plotnick said.

Shapiro said the problem for the Y is not raising enough money for its part of the project. Its campaign has already exceeded the initial goal of $15 million, but not all of that is in hand because pledges are payable over a couple of years. The Y hopes to raise an additional $900,000 for a roof-top running track.

"We're disappointed, we'd love to get started after years in the planning, but delays like this are not unusual in construction," Shapiro said. Specifically, the Y was not satisfied with the breakdown of the prices submitted by the sub-trades, i.e., electricians and plumbers, he said.

The initial call produced seven or eight bids, he said. He believes there's a better chance an acceptable costing will be reached the second time around because the competition will be wider. "We will invite more people; it was too restrictive the first time."

The first element to be constructed is an underground parking lot that will accommodate 260 cars. Overall, the Y is to be expanded by 70,000 square feet and another 30,000 square feet of existing space will be renovated. Highlights include a new pool, gym/auditorium, wrestling pavilion, educational wing and two-storey atrium at the main entrance.

The project was unveiled in July 1997.

"Our benefactors have been supportive and our users understand. They're pleased we have withstood the pressure to build," said Shapiro.

Stavros: Always in Style

Clothes project your image, both internal and external; so you want to wear the best. And super master tailor Stavros Theodoropoulos owes his reputation to giving you his best. A practitioner of his art since 1955, he has tailored clothes for King Constantine of Greece, who still sends him Christmas cards.

While conventional fashions change every six months, master tailors change styles gradually over five to ten years. But a Stavros suit is always in style, carrying effortlessly from year to year, period to period. Famous for its elegant conservative look, it keeps its form as long as 30 years.

At a recent convention of the Custom Tailors and Designers Association of America, other members told Stavros they could not get better suits than his, even in New York. Unique features like hand-stretched and moulded bow-cut breast pockets set Stavros' work apart from the mainstream. While he takes pride in his stature, and has very specific ideas on how each garment should be constructed, Stavros always respects your personal preferences.

and silk; wool and cashmere; wool, cashmere and vicuna.

Of the ten Custom Tailors and Designers Association members who are super master tailors, Stavros is the only Canadian. Saddened by the decline in the tradition of hand work, which no technology can replace, Stavros' pleasure in seeing each suit go out of his shop is bittersweet. He knows that each of these garments, like their creator, is one of a dying breed.

With supple hands, like fine musicians guided by a maestro, Stavros' tailors give each task their best, hand-cutting and sewing each garment from a unique pattern based on a sketch of the wearer's body shape.

Nor can technology replace service. Stavros' three-year warranty includes free cleaning and pressing twice yearly; this too is done by hand, not on a mannequin, where heat and pressure would distort the shape.

While not all men are buying suits now, those who do demand perfection. Stavros welcomes the resurgence of the English double-breasted silhouette look with 2x3 buttons, which moulds itself to body shape. Current trends favour three button single breasted suits, and either double vents or none.

The maestro conducts a small orchestra of fine tailors

The fabrics used in a Stavros suit come only from the world's best mills. Thanks to technological advances, today's super 120's to 180's are the finest, strongest and smoothest materials ever. (Super 120 has 10 kilometres of thread per metre; a suit uses about 40 kilometres of thread, or enough to stretch from Steeles to Lakeshore Blvd. and back again. Getting mileage out of a Stavros suit is more than a figure of speech). Besides wools, there are mixes: wool

Half of Stavros' business is ready-to-wear; these suits too are high-quality, made in-house. With the High Holidays approaching, there is more reason than ever to avail oneself of the skills of this master craftsman. Whatever your preference, drop by Stavros at 95 Cumberland St., on the south side east of Bellair; or call 416-924-8144 for an appointment.

WISHING YOU A HAPPY NEW YEAR

Naot . . . barefoot comfort all year round

The kind of foot comfort you normally associate only with summer is now available year-round with Naot's comprehensive range of fall and winter footwear, presented in Canada by Solemates Inc. Partners Corinne Lissoos and Sandy Galet, with their strong commitment to both Naot and Israel, take pride in this new collection constructed with Naot's famous padded footbed — the best available in any line of comfort footwear.

This cork footbed, which keeps your feet so cool in summer, insulates equally well against winter's cold. It also absorbs shock and moulds to your feet. Some lines even feature a removable footbed — especially useful to orthotic wearers.

NATURAL NAOT COMFORT

For fall and winter '98, there are many fashionable groupings, including the rugged and funky Wildlife collection with clogs and hiking boots. Last year's successful Weekender collection has been expanded to include loafers with beautiful ornaments and names to match, like Hugs & Kisses, Yin Yang and Kokapelli. The Metro collection, with its comfortable block heel, now boasts shoes and boots for both office and evening wear. Many new styles have been added to the hand-stitched clog line that was so popular last year, and the men's footwear collection has been enlarged in response to demand.

Solemates' main business is wholesale and extends across Canada, from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island and the Territories. Quality retailers like Corso and Suzanne's in Toronto and No Mean Feet in Hamilton feature the fall/winter line. Naot's only retail outlet, Prairie Dog on Eglinton West, is the flagship store for new collections. Here, Sandy and Corinne keep in touch with you, the customer. Typical feedback from a happy client: "The only thing better than an old paper of Naots is a new pair of Naots."

For exquisite comfort in the New Year, Naots are it.

Jewish Singles Registry & jmatch.com.... A Match Made in Cyberspace

After many months of preparation, the Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) is excited to announce its association with the newly formed Toronto based Jewish internet dating service called jmatch.com. This "partnership" will result in jmatch offering JSR members FREE access to its site.

"We will now be able to expand our operations worldwide," said JSR owner and founder Rob Singer: "This has been in the works for quite some time. As more and more Registry members register on line, they will be able to access each others' profiles from the comfort and convenience of their own home or office computer, seven days a week, 24 hours a day."

Singer maintains that privacy and confidentiality have always been important components of the JSR system. He notes that with jmatch's Private Members File, JSR members can look forward to the same. Both jmatch and the JSR expect registrations to rise significantly.

Two More Engagements

It's been a busy summer at the JSR, as three couples recently walked down the aisle. The JSR is also happy to report that two more couples have announced their engagement while two more have notified us that chidren are on the way. Mazal Tov!!

Introducing jmatch.com

Meeting Jewish singles has now become easier. Introducing jmatch.com, the Jewish Interactive Dating Service. What's so special about jmatch.com is that there are actually two services to choose from: There's a General Members File, for those who want fast and instantaneous access to the database; and a Private Members File. The latter requires that both a photograph and a copy of identification be submitted to the jmatch offices before the member will be allowed access into the database. The purpose of the Private Members File is to build a database of "serious" singles, and discourage those that just want to browse and see who is on the system. Members will be able to search the database by country, area code, gender, age, marital status, as well as, occupation/profession, and hobbies/interests. For a limited time only the jmatch.com site can be accessed FREE of charge, so go to your computer now and log on to jmatch.com.

Envoy to try to bridge Israel-PA differences

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. special peace envoy Dennis Ross was expected to arrive in Israel this week for a brief visit to the region, diplomatic sources said yesterday.

The Prime Minister's Office anticipates that U.S. President Bill Clinton will hold consultations on the Middle East situation following his return from Russia and Ireland. In the meantime, American sources are trying to lower expectations regarding the Ross visit.

White House press secretary Mike McCurry said Ross, whose last visit to the region was in May, would try to help "narrow the differences between the parties."

A senior aide to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that one key issue, the scope of the West Bank land to be transferred to Palestinian self-rule, was "no longer a problem." The aide, David Bar-Illan, confirmed that Israel has offered to cede a further 13 percent of the West Bank, of which three percent would be designated a "nature reserve."

However, Palestinian negotiator Hassan Asfour said last week that no deal had been struck between the sides and that the gaps were still wide.

Bar-Illan said the Palestinians had backtracked on their agreement to have the "nature reserve" come under Israeli security control. He said a deal would be possible if the Palestinians were prepared to meet their security commitments.

In another development, Israel was furious over comments made by South African President Nelson Mandela in which he blamed Israel and Netanyahu for blocking efforts to advance Middle East peace.

Mandela said Netanyahu's administration had "narrow, chauvinistic interests."

A Foreign Ministry statement in Jerusalem called the comments "unpleasant and unhelpful."

At the opening of the Non-aligned Movement summit last week in Durban, South Africa, attended by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, Mandela said Netanyahu's hard-line positions had "blocked progress toward a just and peaceful solution."

The Israeli Foreign Ministry statement also criticized as one-sided, Mandela's open support for a Palestinian state.

Absorption plans dusted off

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel has begun to dust off emergency absorption plans to prepare for a possible new wave of Russian Jewish immigrants.

In light of the economic crisis ravaging Russia, Yuli Edelstein, Israel's minister of absorption, is preparing plans that take into account a potential immigrant increase of at least 10 to 20 percent, according to an aide.

Before the current crisis, Israel expected about 50,000 to 60,000 Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union this year. According to Edelstein's assessments, however, the number of Russian immigrants could even double if the economic crisis worsens and there is an outburst of anti-Semitism against Jews in Russia.

The economic crisis has not yet driven large numbers of Russian Jews to apply to the Israeli Embassy for immigration visas. But Israeli officials in Russia say there has been a flurry of inquiries in recent days about the visas.

A sharp increase in Russian immigration would likely have a dramatic effect on the Israeli economy.

More than 800,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have immigrated to Israel since 1989, and they played a key role in fuelling Israel's rapid economic growth of about six percent a year in the early 1990s.

But massive immigration also demands an increase in government spending on absorption, which is difficult at a time when the government is committed to cutting the budget deficit.

Former Prisoner of Zion, Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister of industry and trade, was in Russia recently to participate in the dedication of a synagogue in memory of victims of the Holocaust. He held meetings with Jewish community leaders, who told him that the economic crisis has already sparked an increase in anti-Semitic rhetoric.

Meanwhile, during his recent visit to Moscow, U.S. President Bill Clinton met with American Jewish leaders who had come for the commemoration of the new synagogue, and he expressed his concern about instability in Russia and its possible ramifications for the country's Jewish community.

Women of the Wall borrow Lubavitch tactic

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Borrowing a page from the Lubavitch movement, the Women of the Wall group has launched a new outreach campaign to give Israeli women a chance to wrap themselves in a tallit during Jewish prayer.

The organization of women in Israel, who greet each new Jewish month by praying together at the Western Wall, got its inspiration for the campaign from the Lubavitchers, Jessie Bonn, a member of the group, confirmed in an e-mail message from Jerusalem.

The Lubavitch movement sends out emissaries to busy streets all over the world to offer Jewish men passing by the chance to put on t'fillin.

But officials of the chassidic movement are not seeing this bit of imitation as the sincerest form of flattery.

Rabbi Zalman Shmotkin, a spokesperson at Lubavitch headquarters in Brooklyn, offered only a terse "no comment," and a request that the less that is written about any association between the two groups, the better. Like most Orthodox, Lubavitch opposes the concept of women taking on ritual observances traditionally reserved for men.

Twenty to 60 members of Women of the Wall began gathering each month on the women's side of the Western Wall in 1988.

They were met with violence when men praying on the other side of the mechitzah separating the genders threw chairs over the divider at the women and cursed them. The men were offended by what they viewed as women imitating a minyan.

Some haredi Jews also object to the fact that Women of the Wall raise their voices in prayer, contravening the prohibition against men hearing a woman's voice during his prayers, lest he be distracted from his worship.

The women filed a case with Israel's Supreme Court in 1989, a case that has dragged on without resolution.

Both a Knesset commission and a special committee headed by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman studied the matter and asked the women to choose one of several other locations in the Old City, away from the Western Wall, in deference to Orthodox sensibilities.

For members of the women's group, though, none of those alternatives is acceptable; they want permission to pray as a group, with a Torah, at the holiest site in Judaism.

And since none of the mediated efforts has worked, the group expects to be going back to the Supreme Court soon for a decision.

In the meantime, Women of the Wall continues to meet to greet each Jewish month with group prayer in the women's section at the Wall. They then repair to another, less charged spot in the adjacent Jewish Quarter of the Old City to read together from the Torah.

They may not have received permission to pray as a group with a Torah at the Wall, but their ongoing presence is having a positive impact, Phyllis Chesler, a longtime feminist and a director of the International Committee for Women of the Wall, said in an interview here in New York.

Though there was, at first, great tension between them, now the "other women at the Kotel, including ultra-Orthodox women, are listening, smiling, and being friendly and helpful," said Chesler. "Recently a regular worshiper at the wall invited the Women of the Wall to participate in her kiddush."

Meanwhile, Women of the Wall is trying to reach out to other Israelis. After getting permission from the Jerusalem municipality, the group recently set up a table, in busy Zion Square, with literature about its activities.

Rabbi Mendy Feldman of the Lubavitch congregation was at Halifax International Airport; Rabbi David Ellis, chaplain of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC), was stationed at Canadian Forces Base Shearwater in suburban Dartmouth, where a makeshift morgue had been set up; and Rabbi Saul Aronov of the Orthodox Beth Israel Synagogue was available to families arriving at Halifax-area hotels.

Jon Goldberg, the AJC's executive director, said many area families had offered their homes for accommodations. In addition, he had contacted the area's observant families to provide kosher meals, if necessary.

"Our community is only about 1,500 people, but when the families arrive, the Halifax Jews will welcome them. We're here to help any Jewish people who need it," Goldberg said.

By last Friday, even before a complete passenger list was available, it was known there were at least 15 Jewish victims, identified to religious authorities in New York and Geneva.

It was estimated as many as 50 Jewish passengers were among the 229 who perished in the crash.

Goldberg said telephone calls started coming to the AJC's office within hours of the crash.

He said he spoke to Rabbi Edward Gluck in New York the day after the crash. The rabbi is the official Jewish advisor to the Port Authority of New York (which oversees flights leaving the city). He's also Mayor Rudolph Guilliani's chief Jewish advisor.

"He told me seven people identified themselves to rabbis in New York as being relatives of victims. A rabbi in Geneva said he'd heard from eight families with victims on the Swiss list. Those are the only ones known by name," Goldberg said.

The first inquiry to the AJC office came from Gush Etzion in Israel, from the family of crash victim Dr. Jonathan Mann, a former professor at the Harvard School of Public Health and a pioneer in the fight against AIDS.

The family, which said it was planning to leave soon for Halifax, requested information about the local chevrah kadishah.

"The passengers' families may require services that are not available in Halifax," Goldberg said. "We have no Jewish funeral home here, and in the chevrah kadishah, we're all volunteers."

A memorial service for victims was scheduled at Beth Israel Synagogue last Sunday.

Shaare Zedek Saved His Life

Harel was born prematurely weighing only 950 grams with life threatening health problems. He was treated for three months in the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit at Shaare Zedek Medical Center, Jerusalem.

He left Shaare Zedek Medical Center on what was supposed to have been his due date. Today, he is a healthy, vibrant toddler … another Shaare Zedek miracle!

Harel was one of more than 600 seriously ill newborns treated in Shaare Zedek's renowned Neonatal Intensive Care Unit every year - often at a cost of over $1,000 U.S. per day. Built to accommodate far fewer infants, the facility is seriously overcrowded and underequipped.

We must raise $5,000,000 U.S. to enlarge the Unit and purchase new state-of-the-art equipment. Without this, Shaare Zedek may have to turn away patients. With your help we can reach our goal.

Money the last word?

One aspect of the concern is that "the real crime, the crime of genocide" will be overshadowed by monetary concerns, said Michael Berenbaum, president of the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation in Los Angeles.

But while Berenbaum and others believe that the concentrated attention on the details of negotiations and distribution will take precedence over commemoration and moral lessons for the moment, the former director of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's research institute said he was sure that in the long run, "the ultimate crime will come to the fore.

"There are important projects for remembrance that will be here years from now" dedicated to preserving the memory of Holocaust victims, he said.

Stuart Eizenstat, U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs and the Clinton administration's point man on Holocaust restitution, said he is convinced that Holocaust education in Europe will be one of the most important outgrowths of the settlement, because it "will outlive the survivors and all of us."

This will lead to" more sensitive and moral people" in the future and "more just policies by countries," said Eizenstat in a telephone interview following the Swiss agreement.

Establishing Holocaust education in schools is one of the projects the State Department is most pushing for as it pursues settlements with America's European allies, Eizenstat said.

If it were not for the proliferation in recent years of Holocaust institutions and educational programs in the United States, others point out, the current claims would never have received the support of American politicians, whose efforts in Congress and at the state and local levels brought pressure upon the Swiss banks to settle.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg, president of the Jewish Life Network, a group that develops continuity programs, called the restitution efforts made by national and local politicians a moral breakthrough.

"People are now in favor of memory instead of against it," Greenberg said. "It means we really got the message across."

Greenberg, who also is a member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, said the Swiss banks settlement will be a further stimulus to preserving the memory of the systematic murder of six million Jews.

The publicity surrounding the Swiss-Jewish negotiations "is a further reminder of what was done or not done in the Holocaust," he said.

Deborah Lipstadt, a professor of Holocaust Studies at Emory University in Atlanta said much the same thing.

"This is not reparation, this is not guilt money. This is the plain old result of attempted robbery by banks," she said. "We're talking about goods and valuables because the people are gone."

For the Holocaust survivors who will receive some payment from the settlement, most of them now in their 80s, there is another concern – that a well-publicized fight for their rightful possessions, more than 50 years after World War II, will be a sorry postscript to their own lives.

Noting the embarrassment engendered by the unpleasant episode, Greenberg said, "The fact is the banks are returning a fraction of what they stole" and the settlement money "is going to be used primarily to ease the isolation and poverty of survivors.

"It is perverse to question either one of those. It should be a matter of pride and responsibility that those steps are being taken. Saying that taking money is cheapening is perverse. It's the least we could do for the survivors and the least the banks could do," he added.

TEL AVIV, Sept. 10 – A striking change for the worse in the Palestine military picture and in the possibility of continued peace took place today with the arrival of a large Iraqi force from Mafrak, Transjordan. This brings the strength of the Iraqi army to about 10,000 men – the largest Arab force in Palestine. (Ed.'s note: The reference to the "Palestine military picture" is to the military plight of the Jews. Prior to Israel's founding, the term Palestinians always referred to the Jews of Palestine.)

Attack, recrimination now mark 'softer' elements of the right

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Members of the extreme right recently demonstrated against one of their own for what they considered to be a deviation from right-wing ideology: He declared a willingness to give up parts of the Land of Israel. Their target was Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

Opinion

Not far from where the demonstration took place, the extreme right had organized something similar against former Shin Bet chief Carmi Gilon, branding him "a persecutor of the Jewish people" – the same kind of label that was assigned to Yitzhak Rabin, which, according to Jewish law, is punishable by death.

Such behavior did not emerge from the outer fringes of the political spectrum. The atmosphere of attack and recrimination, which includes the delegitimation of public figures, is being created by the "softer," less extreme segments of the political right.

Initially, the extreme right denounced Mordechai for not supporting the Israeli demand that the Palestinian National Council abrogate the Palestinian charter. Then they claimed that he was spreading an exaggerated sense of optimism by declaring that the negotiations over a second redeployment in the West Bank would soon be brought to a successful culmination. Finally they said he was responsible for failing to get Kiryat Shmonah residents into their bomb shelters before the recent barrage of Katyusha rockets fired by Hezbollah in the north.

The source of all three accusations was the Prime Minister's Office (PMO).

This is an absurd pattern of behavior in our highest echelon of power, and it must be stopped. It is possible that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has no idea who is feeding the flames of hatred, although he is well aware of the fact that, should he make any territorial concessions, he himself will not be immune from attack by the extreme right.

For the past few months, there have been reports that right-wing extremists are prepared to carry out their threats against any Israeli political leader who cedes territory to the Palestinians. In light of this, the Shin Bet security service is increasing its protection of the prime minister.

Some people say the Shin Bet is being too aggressive in its protective services, but the agency claims that the report published by the Shamgar commission following the Rabin assassination forces it to take every possible precaution, in order to fully protect the prime minister. Furthermore, the government has adopted the commission's recommendations, which thus take on the character of a cabinet decision.

A few months ago, the government decided that a ministerial committee would review VIP protection procedures, but that committee has not yet been convened. Instead, a special committee has been appointed to study the safeguarding of public figures in Israel and to submit recommendations.

The committee consists of the former president of the Military Court of Appeals, Brig.-Gen. Ben-Zion Farhi; former Mossad chief Nahum Admoni; and Maj.-Gen. Doron Rubin. However, this committee has also not begun its work.

Ideological crisis

Sources in the PMO claim that the extreme left is also a threat. There are no intelligence reports on any danger from the extreme left, although obviously one must always take into account the possibility of a lone assassin. The difference between this hypothetical assassin and Rabin's killer, Yigal Amir, is that Amir did not act alone.

Although he was the only one to pull the trigger, Amir enjoyed the support of many. The extreme right had a history of involvement with assassinations even before Rabin was gunned down. It also has a strong political lobby and a broad-based infrastructure, both ideological and organizational. Members of the extreme right have even smuggled weapons and explosives from the IDF.

In addition, in contrast with the left, a segment of the right has undergone a process of radicalization over the past two years. More and more groups expressing frustration and experiencing an ideological crisis over the peace process have sprung up. If these groups should choose a charismatic leader, the potential danger they pose would grow.

Presently, that danger consists of the possibility of a mass murder similar to the Baruch Goldstein massacre of Muslim worshippers in the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron in 1994, or the possibility of an outbreak of violence on the Temple Mount, for example, in order to kill the peace process.

Under such circumstances, the Shin Bet needs the support of both the prime minister and the public at large. So far, there have been no reports alleging that Netanyahu is preventing the Shin Bet from doing its job.

It should be recalled here that Yitzhak Shamir, in the post of prime minister, did not hesitate to use the Shin Bet against the right-wing terrorist organization that operated in the territories. In this respect, he did not emulate his predecessor Menachem Begin, who, as prime minister, ordered the Shin Bet to destroy many of its files on members of the extreme right .

The extreme right does pose a potential threat. However, it should be emphasized that the main thrust of the Shin Bet today is directed against the terrorist activities of Hamas and the Islamic Jihad, which has recently accepted recruits from the Damascus-based Abu Moussa group.

Toronto doctor to receive Israeli science award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The first International Prize for Science will be awarded by Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital Jerusalem to Toronto's Dr. Stanley Greben, former psychiatrist-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital.

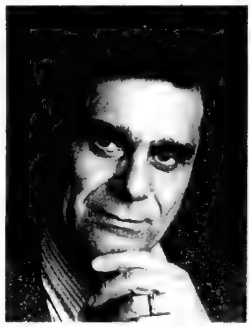
Greben, who has been active with the Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital for more than 25 years, will receive his award at a gala concert Sept. 13 at 7:30 p.m. at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, George Weston Hall.

The first psychiatrist-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital, Greben served in that capacity for 18 years. At the same time, he was also psychiatrist-in-chief of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

During his career, he served residents of both Canada and Israel, and was chairman of the board of directors of the Canadian Psychiatric Association for 10 years.

In 1950, when he was a medical student, he visited Israel and saw people from the Russian camps arriving in Israel.

"They ran down the gangplank and kissed the ground...I was moved that 2,000 years ago, presumably my forebears had come from that same piece of land, walked to Russia, and here we are coming back," he said in an interview.



Dr. Stanley E. Greben

"I was very impressed with the idealism of the people of Israel and how much they had accomplished in such a short time. [It] was the beginning of my commitment to Israel," he said.

Twenty-five years ago, he was asked to establish a medical advisory board of psychiatrists from across Canada for the Jerusalem hospital. He became the driving force behind the establishment of the Albert and Temmy Latner Institute for Research in social psychiatry and psychotherapy at Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital.

The hospital, he said, "is dedicated to combining excellence in research with compassion in care, to ensure, maintain and enhance the quality of life for the elderly and the mentally ill."

In 1982, he taught for three months at the Jerusalem hospital and he has gone to Israel several times to present papers. During the Lebanese War, he worked in Safed with social workers, psychologists, and others who were treating soldiers affected by loosing friends, recovering from injuries, or suffering from post traumatic stress disorders.

"What I've gained is an infinite connection to what really goes on in life in Israel and the practice of psychiatry there. I believe that they appreciate knowing that I and others are interested in their welfare – I know it means a lot to them to know that even in troubled times, we come to be with them. They feel less isolated."

The Latner Institute aims to pursue research in the psychological aspect of psychiatric treatment, he said, and specifically the treatment of the after-effects of immigration, trauma and the illnesses of old age, terrorism, economic insecurity and others.

Greben is a professor emeritus at the University of Toronto and has more than 75 publications to his credit, including books and journals dealing with psychiatry and the psychotherapeutic-psychoanalytic relationship.

He and his wife Marilyn have two children, a son Dr. Daniel Greben, and a daughter Jan, an architect in New York City. Daniel and his wife Jill have two children, Alexander, 4, and Rachel 2.

Renee Rubinstein, president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital praised Greben for his "pioneering efforts in psychiatry and his years of dedication and service to the people of Canada and Israel."

This makes him "a worthy choice for this award," Rubinstein said, noting that the Toronto Friends traditionally presents an annual fundraising concert, but this is the first time someone will be honored with this new award.

The concert will feature three internationally acclaimed musicians: Jacques Israelievitch, violinist and concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra; Shaun Rolston on cello; and composer and arranger, John Arpin on piano. Proceeds will be used for Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital's research into Alzheimer and Parkinson disease.

For tickets and information call the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital at 416-256-4222.

Home baking's a real treat for the senses

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Is anything more guaranteed to get the tastebuds working, and have vows of following one's diet over the holidays forgotten, than the smell of baking, or the sight of a gorgeous cake on the counter?

Toronto certainly has a plethora of fine bakeries, but cakes, pastries and bread baked at home appeal to the senses in a very elemental way.

Marcy Goldman is a Montreal-based baker and restaurant bakery consultant who has written extensively, including in The CJN. Her articles on baking genuine Montreal bagels are quoted frequently in the dispute about the superiority of Montreal or Toronto bagels.

Her recently published book, A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking (Doubleday, 1998) is a luscious concoction of recipes, divided by Jewish holy day. It is well worth having, since not only are the recipes good, but Goldman does an excellent job of explaining techniques and offering special tips.

This does tend to make the recipes look somewhat long, but in fact they are reassuringly detailed.

One nice aspect of the book is Goldman's explanations of the Jewish holiday rituals and customs, as well as reminiscences of family times.

Each recipe comes with hints and suggestions for alternative methods or ingredients, when called for.

Unlike many cookbooks, A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking is printed on beige, non-shiny paper, making it easy on the eyes. Here are two recipes that will be great for the High Holy Day season.

LEMON, VANILLA & HONEY BAKLAVA

1 1-lb. package filo pastry leaves (about 25)
1 cup (2 sticks) unsalted butter or margarine, melted
½ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup finely ground walnuts
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 tbsp. sugar
Honey Vanilla Syrup
2 cups water
2 cups sugar
1 cup honey
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Trim filo sheets to fit the pan – either a 9 x

Home baked cakes, breads are a real treat

13 or a rectangular pan with similar capacity, with 2½ in. sides. Do not use a nonstick pan as it will be ruined when you cut out pieces of baklava. Keep the filo sheets covered with a slightly damp towel.

In a bowl, stir together the butter or margarine and the oil. Drizzle a few tbsp. of the butter/oil mixture on the pan bottom. Centre 1 sheet of filo on the bottom of the pan and brush it generously with the butter and oil. Continue layering filo sheets, brushing each very generously with melted butter/oil.

After 8 sheets, sprinkle ⅓ of the ground nuts over the top surface. Continue layering filo leaves this way, sprinkling with nuts after another 8 sheets have been laid in place. Sprinkle on more nuts, then 4 more leaves, more nuts, and the remaining leaves, always brushing each sheet generously before you place the next one in the pan.

Brush the top layer with the butter/oil mixture. Using kitchen scissors or a sharp knife, cut the pastry into diamond shapes, cutting only halfway through the pastry. (Diamond shapes are achieved by cutting 5 or 6 horizontal rows, then cutting diagonally across these rows to form diamonds). Bake for 1 hr., or until the pastry is golden brown. Meanwhile, make the syrup. Makes 30 pastries.

Syrup: In a saucepan, combine the syrup ingredients and heat until the sugar dissolves. Bring to a boil and simmer for about 5 minutes. Cool to room temperature before pouring evenly over the pastry. Let the baklava sit for 1 hour or overnight before serving.

GOLDEN SHOFAR CAKE

¾ cup vegetable oil
1½ cups granulated sugar
4 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract
½ tsp. lemon oil or extract
1 tbsp. finely minced lemon zest
2½ cups all-purpose flour
¼ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. baking powder
¾ cup apricot juice or nectar
½ cup chopped dried apricots or chopped frozen mango pieces
¼ cup chopped golden raisins

Lemon Glaze/Topping
1½ cups confectioners' sugar
⅓ cup fresh lemon juice
shredded lemon zest, for topping

Preheat oven to 325. Generously grease and flour a 9-inch tube pan or a 12-cup bundt pan.

In a large mixing bowl, blend together the oil and sugar. Blend in the eggs, vanilla, lemon oil, and the zest. Stir in the flour, salt and baking powder alternately with the apricot juice. Blend until smooth. Fold in the apricots or chopped mango and the raisins.

Spoon the batter into the pan and bake until the cake is lightly golden and springs back when pressed gently (45-55 min.). Cool for 10 minutes before inverting onto a serving plate. Makes 14-16 serving.

Lemon Glaze: In a bowl, whisk together the confectioners' sugar and lemon juice. Using a cake tester, make holes in the still warm cake. Drizzle the glaze over the cake and garnish it with shreds of lemon zest Cool well before serving.

Some special holiday dishes

This time of year always brings back memories of how things used to be – the customs of our families, the special dishes that used to appear on the table, the crowded dining room table.

Johanna Ginsberg, assistant director of communications for the Jewish Theological Seminary, sent The CJN these recipes from her relatives.

GRANDMA EDNA'S CHALUPTSES (STUFFED CABBAGE)

2 lbs. chopped meat
1 large head cabbage
1 medium onion, grated or chopped fine
¼ cup ketchup
1 or 2 cans sweet style tomato soup
salt and pepper to taste

Sauce
1 28-oz can tomatoes
1 16-oz can tomato sauce
1 or 2 sliced onions
3 sliced carrots
⅓ - ½ cup brown sugar
lemon juice to taste
½ cup raisins
salt and pepper to taste

Boil cabbage until soft, 15-30 minutes. Cool. Remove core and carefully remove leaves.

Combine chopped meat with onion, ketchup, salt and pepper.

In a large pot, combine all sauce ingredients and simmer while preparing cabbage rolls. The amount of sugar and lemon is up to the individual. Keep tasting.

Place 1 tbsp. meat mixture on each leaf, roll, tuck in sides and keep rolling. Place seam side down in pot on top of sauce.

Cover and simmer about 2 hours, basting occasionally. Can be frozen at this point.

When ready to serve, place in shallow pan, cover with tomato soup and heat in 350 oven for about ½ hour, or until brown on top and heated through.

EVALYN'S HONEY CAKE

4 eggs
1½ cups sugar
½ cup oil
½ cup molasses
1 cup honey
½ tsp. ground cloves
½ cup nuts, chopped
1 cup raisins
sliced almonds
½ tsp. ground ginger
½ tsp. ground allspice
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
2 tbsp. brandy
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup black coffee
3½ cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. baking soda

Beat eggs well. Add sugar and beat well. Add almost ½ cup oil, molasses, honey, cloves, ginger, allspice, cinnamon, brandy and vanilla. Add alternately coffee and flour, baking powder and baking soda. Fold in chopped nuts and raisins.

Bake in greased and floured 11 x 14-in. pan at 350 for 50 minutes or until done. Sprinkle with almonds before baking. Makes a very large cake or two smaller loaves.

FOOD IDEAS FOR ROSH HASHANAH

Zucchini is just yummy

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Zucchini is a great vegetable. It is full of vitamins, high in fiber, has a fairly long storage life, and its texture is so versatile that it is just as delicious in a casserole as it is in a dessert.

ZUCCHINI COBBLER

8 cups chopped, seeded, peeled zucchini (about 3 pounds)
2/3 cup lemon juice
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground nutmeg
Crust:
4 cups flour
2 cups sugar
1 1/2 cups cold butter
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

In a large saucepan, over medium-low heat, cook and stir zucchini and lemon juice for 15-20 minutes or until zucchini is tender. Add sugar, cinnamon and nutmeg; simmer one minute longer. Remove from heat and set aside.

For crust, combine flour and sugar in a bowl; cut in butter until mixture resembles course crumbs. Stir 1/2 cup into zucchini mixture. Press half of remaining crust mixture into a greased 15x10x1-inch baking pan.

Spread zucchini mixture over top; crumble remaining crust mixture over zucchini. Sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake at 375 for 35-40 minutes or until golden and bubbly. NOTE: Most people will think this is made with apples.

ZUCCHINI LASAGNA

2 1/2 cups zucchini, sliced 1/4 inch thick (about 2 medium)
1/4 cup chopped onion
1 red pepper, diced
1 green pepper, diced
2 small tomatoes, cut up
6 oz. can tomato paste
1 clove garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. dried oregano
1/2 tsp. dried basil
1/4 tsp. dried thyme
1/4 cup water
1/8 tsp. pepper
1 egg
1/4 cup low fat cottage cheese
1/2 cup shredded mozzarella cheese
1 tsp. flour

Cook zucchini until tender, drain and set aside. Fry onions and peppers until they are tender; drain. Add tomatoes, tomato paste, garlic, oregano, basil, thyme, water and pepper and bring to a boil. Reduce heat; simmer, uncovered 10 minutes or until reduced to 3 cups and set aside.

In small bowl slightly beat egg. Add cottage cheese, half of shredded cheese and flour. In 1/2-qt. baking-roasting pan arrange half of the onion-pepper mixture.

Top with half of the zucchini and all the cottage cheese mixture. Top with remaining onion-pepper mixture and zucchini. Bake uncovered at 375 for 30 minutes. Sprinkle with remaining cheese. Bake 10 minutes longer. Let stand 10 minutes before serving. Serves 4.

ZUCCHINI BREAD

3 eggs
2 cups sugar
1/4 cup oil
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups grated zucchini
2 cups plain flour
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1 cup nuts, chopped

Preheat oven to 350. In large bowl combine eggs, sugar, and oil, blend well and set aside. In another bowl combine the flour, cinnamon, baking soda salt, and baking powder.

Add the flour mixture to the egg mixture, mix slightly and add the zucchini, mix together. Add vanilla and nuts; mix together. Grease and flour two loaf pans and split the batter between the two pans. Bake for 1 hour at 350.

It's time to start cooking

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

They say it's never too early to prepare for the holidays. I tend to agree. Getting those new "show off in shul clothes," finding the holiday prayer books and for me figuring out who's coming for lunch after services and what am I going to serve that doesn't require too much effort but looks like it did always keeps me busy.

Apples have many uses

during serving, dip wedges in lemon juice so they won't turn brown)

BUTTERNUT APPLE SOUFFLE

2 lbs. butternut squash, peeled and cut into 1-inch cubes
4 Jonathan or Macintosh apples, peeled, cored and chopped
1/2 cup sugar
2 cups cranberries, thawed if frozen
2 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. margarine (or butter)

Place squash in a steamer basket over boiling water. Cover saucepan and steam 15 minutes or until tender. Remove from steamer basket and set aside.

Combine apples and sugar in a heavy saucepan over medium heat. Cook 8 minutes, stirring frequently. Stir in cranberries and cook 4 to 5 minutes, or until cranberries and apples are tender but still chunky and the liquid has evaporated. Add the squash, margarine and salt and pepper to taste. Stir over heat until hot and serve immediately.

APPLE PECAN PASTRY PUFFS

1 cup brown sugar, packed
1/2 cup all purpose flour
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/8 tsp. ground nutmeg
2 cups Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored and diced
1 cup chopped pecans
1 tbsp. margarine or butter, chilled, cut into small pieces
1 sheet frozen puff pastry, thawed
1 tbsp. confectioner's sugar

Preheat oven to 375F. Combine sugar, flour, cinnamon and nutmeg in a bowl and mix thoroughly. Add the apples, pecan and margarine or butter ingredients and toss to coat.

Unfold the pastry on a lightly floured surface. Roll into a 15 x 10-inch rectangle. Brush lightly with water. Spoon apple mixture over pastry to within 2 inches of long sides and all the way to short sides. Roll up jellyroll fashion. Cut into 1 1/4 inch slices.

Arrange 2 inches apart on a greased baking sheet. Bake 15 minutes on middle rack of oven or until golden. Remove and cool on wire rack. Sprinkle with confectioner's sugar. This recipe serves 12 people. Because this recipe is for a particular size pan, it adjusts the number of servings only in multiples of 12.

APPLE RUM TURKEY FILLETS

2 1/2 cups apple juice
1/4 cup plus 1 tbsp. dark rum, or 2 tsp. rum extract
8 6-ounce turkey fillets
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. honey
2 tbsp. cornstarch
1/4 cup cold water
2 tart apples, peeled and cut into thin slices

Combine 1 cup apple juice, 2 tsp. rum and salt and pepper to taste in a bowl. Pour this marinade over turkey in a shallow dish, cover and marinate 2 hours in refrigerator. Prepare the grill or turn on broiler. Grill turkey fillets for about 5 minutes per side or until cooked throughout.

Combine remaining apple juice and rum in a saucepan over medium heat. Stir in honey and bring to a boil. Stir cornstarch into cold water and add to boiling liquid, stirring constantly until well blended. Add the apples and cook 2 minutes. Drizzle apple rum sauce over each turkey fillet. Garnish with fresh apple wedges if desired. Serves 8.

Apples, apples everywhere

Seep tea bags in boiling water for five to ten minutes. Discard tea bags and add all other ingredients. Chill. Serve in a pitcher and over ice. Serves 8 to 10

CARROT AND APPLE TZIMMES

4 cups carrots, grated
1 tablespoon fine barley
¼ cup apples, grated
1 stick margarine
½ cup water
½ tsp. salt
2 tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. nutmeg

Combine all the ingredients in a saucepan and mix well. Cover and cook over low heat for 2 hours, or until the barley is soft. Watch carefully while cooking and add more water if necessary. Stir occasionally if necessary. Serves 8

APPLE HARVEST RICE

1 cup thinly sliced carrots
2 tbsp. reduced fat margarine
1¼ cups water
¼ cup apple juice
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 cup uncooked rice
½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ cup raisins
½ cup sliced green onions
2 cups cored, sliced, unpeeled apples
1 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds

In a saucepan cook the carrots in the margarine until tender-crisp, about 5 minutes. Stir constantly so they don't stick. Add the water, apple juice, lemon juice, brown sugar, salt, rice, cinnamon and raisins. Bring to a boil. Then reduce heat, cover and simmer until the rice is tender and liquid is absorbed, about 15 minutes. Gently stir in green onions and apples, heat thoroughly. Turn into a serving dish and top with sesame seeds. Serves 6 to 8.

TAFFY APPLE SALAD

2 cups kosher miniature marshmallows
1 large can pineapple chunks, reserve juice
1½ tsp. white vinegar
½ cup sugar
2 tbsp. flour
1 egg, lightly beaten
2 cups Granny Smith apples, diced
2 cups Red Delicious apples, diced
½ cup salted peanuts (no skins)
8 oz pareve whipped topping

In a small bowl mix together the marshmallows and drained pineapple. The pineapple may be cut into smaller pieces if you wish. Save pineapple juice. Mix juice, sugar, vinegar and flour and lightly beaten egg. Microwave 6 to 8 minutes; stir halfway through cooking time and continue cooking until thick. Refrigerate and cover until next day.

*Alternative Cooking Method: Combine flour with sugar and then stir in juice. Cook on the stove until thick. Stir constantly.

An hour before serving combine apples, peanuts, marshmallows, pineapple, and juice mixture and stir well. Chill. Fold in whipped topping just before serving.

Note: I usually add an extra cup of marshmallows and more diced apples. Try the salad once as it is and then adjust to your taste.

Place a lettuce leaf on salad plate and spoon salad on top.

APPLE CAKE

Utilizing apples and honey, this easy-to-make cake is moist and delicious on its own, but the frosting turns it into a lavish holiday dessert. The cake and frosting can be made with non-dairy margarine for meatless meals.

2¼ lb. sweet apples, peeled, halved, cored and finely diced
1¼ cups sugar
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. (2¼ sticks) unsalted, non-dairy margarine or butter, softened
¼ cup honey
3 large eggs
3 cups all-purpose flour
2½ tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. finely grated orange rind
1 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped

FOOD IDEAS FOR ROSH HASHANAH

Kosher cooking is anything but boring

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Many people still have the idea that kosher cooking is too bland, too rich, too old-fashioned and too unimaginative.

Ethel Hofman, a well-known food writer, proves in her book, Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home, that this attitude is unjustified (HarperCollins, 1997). Roasted vegetables, a liberal use of herbs and spices, low fat recipes, and extensive use of today's popular grilling and broiling cooking techniques, coupled with a selection of foods from all over the world, are sure to appeal to the palate.

Jalapeno peppers, arugula and fresh mint are only a few of the interesting ingredients. And who could object to chicken roasted with pomegranate, minted peach soup, papaya with lemon cream and coconut, or halibut with rhubarb sauce?

That is not to say that traditional Jewish cooking has no place in this book. Hofman includes such familiar staples as chicken fricasee, herring, fruit compote livened up with dried cherries, kiwi fruit and amaretto liquor, and kasha and bow ties. There is even a recipe for grieben, "assuming of course you're not worried about cholesterol," Hofman allows.

There is one of the best Passover recipe sections I have seen in a long time, with such interesting selections as charoset made with apricots and cherries, peach mocha torte, and spinach-tomato matzah strata.

Instructions are easy to follow, and this is one book with a really helpful index.

SWEET CARROT AND DATE DOME

This is a Persian dish traditionally served at Rosh Hashanah.

½ cup long-grain white rice
2 tbsp. walnut oil
4 cups carrot coins
1 tsp. salt
½ cup chopped pitted dates
2 tbsp. thawed frozen orange juice concentrate ½ tsp. kosher turmeric
¼ cup chopped fresh mint

In a large saucepan, cook rice in walnut oil over medium-high heat, stirring, for 2 minutes. Add carrot coins, salt and 1½ cups water. Bring to a boil, cover, reduce heat to low, and cook 20 minutes, or until rice is tender and water is absorbed.

Stir in dates, orange juice and turmeric. Turn out onto a warm platter and shape into a dome. Serve at once, garnished with fresh mint. Serves 4.

APPLE AND ALMOND KUGEL

1½ cups chopped dried pears
½ cup dried cranberries
¼ cup kosher brandy
2 Granny Smith apples, cored and chopped
1 21-oz. can kosher apple pie filling
1 lb. small pasta shells (orecchiette), cooked and drained
3 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. grated orange zest
2 tsp. cinnamon
⅓ cup packed brown sugar
⅓ cup ground almonds

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a large baking dish with nonstick cooking spray.

Place dried pears and cranberries in a small bowl. Pour brandy over fruit. Stir and cover tightly with plastic wrap. Set aside for 30 minutes.

In a separate bowl, mix apples, apple pie filling, pasta, eggs, orange zest, and cinnamon. Stir in dried fruit and brandy mixture.

Transfer to prepared baking dish. Mix brown sugar and ground almonds. Sprinkle over top of kugel.

Bake in preheated oven for 1 hr., or until golden brown and set in centre. Serve hot or at room temperature. Serves 10 to 12.

FOOD IDEAS FOR ROSH HASHANAH

Variety of wines available

By SHARON KANON
WZPS

At Rosh Hashanah, Jews throughout the world will fill their cups with sweet red wine to make the traditional blessing for kiddush, to thank God for the fruit of the grapevine, to sanctify the day, and to give thanks for having endured another year.

If your tastes are more cosmopolitan, however, you might want to make a toast to the New Year with a soft berry fruit-flavored Yarden Cabernet Sauvignon (a prize-winning wine from the Golan Winery), or the Carmel Shomron Petite Sirah, awarded a bronze medal and best buy designation at the 1998 World Wine Championships. These are only some of the superior selection of award-winning wines produced by Israeli wineries today.

Israel has 17 wineries and three more are expected to begin production within a year. As the demand for wine increases in Israel and the rest of the world, local wine makers are taking steps to reclaim their centuries-old reputation as quality vintners. Increased demand for red wine has created a challenge for Israeli wine makers.

"There is a tremendous rebirth of the wine industry in Israel," says wine-maker Louis Pasco. The former Californian earned a master's degree in food science and technology at UC Davis and worked in the Napa Valley wine industry for seven years before moving to Israel in 1996. He has now found his niche at the Tishbi Estate Winery (Baron Wine Cellars) in Binyamina, near Zichron Ya'acov.

Typical of an "estate" winery, the Tishbi family cultivates its own grape vines and makes the wine. Initially, Tishbi was the first in a new wave of boutique wineries, but it now produces over half a million bottles a year.

The Mediterranean climate is suitable for growing grapes. In fact, viticulture was an economic mainstay in biblical times, and vineyards were planted throughout the land of Israel with adjoining wine presses.

"Israel was one of the birthplaces of wine-making, and wine is part of the Jewish culture," says Pasco.

Vineyards are used as symbols of positive qualities in biblical texts. In Genesis (49:11) for example, a glimpse of the Messianic era envisions Judah's vineyards, lush and flowing with wine.

Attesting to 5,000-year-old biblical know-how is the story of Noah. Unfortunately, the man who saved all the species of the earth guzzled wine from the vineyards he planted, became intoxicated and took off his clothes. His humiliation and curse reverberated throughout history.

During talmudic times, wine was a popular drink. The Talmud refers to more than eight Hebrew words for wine, to denote its age and mix with other ingredients. Among them are caper wine, raisin wine, wine mixed with honey and pepper, spiced, and smoked wine.

The sages not only appreciated "old wine," they also recognized its positive effect on good health. The story is told of a rabbi who was cured of a severe bowel disorder by drinking 70-year-old apple wine.

In Babylonia, the Jews were also vintners, and retained their reputation throughout Europe, even during the Middle Ages. Drinking wine instead of water was a common custom to avoid the bubonic plague.

The Jews of Spain were active in the wine trade, even after the expulsion. Copious wine drinking by the upper Jewish social strata is frequently mentioned in Jewish poetry from Spain.

Baron Edmund de Rothschild was the driving force behind the revival of viticulture in Palestine in the late 19th century.

FOOD IDEAS FOR ROSH HASHANAH

Za'atar an integral element in Israeli cuisine

By DANIELLA ASHKENAZY
Special to The CJN

An Israeli product called za'atar is an aromatic condiment made from hyssop, a herb known since biblical times.

Hyssop is a basic food among local Arabs. It is eaten on freshly baked pita bread, dipped in olive oil or even chewed by the handful by some. The herb, which is reminiscent of marjoram, is prized for its flavor and aroma. But it has also been credited with a number of medicinal characteristics: for example, it has a reputation as a cure for stomach aches.

Most za'atar is consumed as a condiment made by grinding hyssop leaves to produce an aromatic, coarse, brownish green powder, which is then blended with olive oil, toasted sesame seeds, sumac, chickpeas and wheat.

The hyssop plant is native to the hill regions of Israel and parts of Lebanon and southern Syria, and can also be found in small quantities in the arid hill regions of Jordan.

According to Dr. A.E. Putievsky, an expert in herbs at the Volcani Agricultural Institute, the herb was not harvested only for home consumption, but was also exported to the rest of the Middle East and North Africa. The export potential, dwindling supplies, fear of fines, and rising standards of living which allowed consumers to buy ready-made za'atar instead of gathering the leaves and preparing the mix at home, all contributed to commercial production of za'atar in Israel.

Putievsky spent eight years screening varieties of za'atar for high yield and strong aroma and streamlining labor-heavy harvesting procedures.

In the early '90s, when commercial growing began, the manufacturing and packaging of the herb was done in a small corrugated shed in a moshav in the Galilee. The business catered primarily to local Arabs at the time, but it has since grown into a full-scale business that includes a large Jewish clientele.

For Israeli Jews, za'atar used to be an exotic treat associated with visits to Arab bakeries. Today, commercial production has made it an integral element in Israeli cuisine. Za'atar is not only eaten with bread, it is also used to season meat, as a topping on spreads, and sprinkled on salads. Distinctive 100-gram pyramid-shaped containers, which retail at about $1.30 each, can be found on spice racks in any supermarket.

Israeli za'atar is also being taken home by residents of Arab countries who visit Israel. For years, all za'atar was confiscated by customs officials at the border when visitors left, under the assumption it was contraband, gathered illegally in the wild. Once commercial production began, however, rules were changed to allow tourists to take home commercially produced za'atar.

Today, fresh za'atar, once harvested only in the spring, is grown the year round in the Galilee, under drip irrigation. Even the back-breaking job of picking the leaves has been eliminated, as they are now harvested with a combine. The leaves are then dried in special ovens, and some are mixed with other ingredients to produce the condiment.

According to Nativ Dudai, a colleague of Putievsky, there are indications that za'atar is also being grown commercially in the areas under Palestinian self-government.

Putievsky believes the economic potential for export of za'atar is excellent. It is already exported to western countries such as Canada, England and the United States, which have large Arab communities. Jordan also constitutes a natural market for export, just over the border.

Tantalizing tomato treats

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Just in case you have a few too many tomatoes on the vine or in the kitchen, I want to pass along my favorite tip to make sure your tomatoes keep the best flavor possible.

Do not refrigerate tomatoes! They will retain their flavor and ripen best at room temperature. Furthermore, once they are ripe, they need to be used within three days.

I also came across this little bit of tomato trivia while checking out the recipes, and while it is perfectly useless, it is a lot of fun and you can use it to amuse and amaze your family and friends. Did you know that in 1893, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the tomato must be considered a vegetable, even though botanically it is a fruit.

That was because then, as today, vegetables and fruits were subject to different import duties, and it was necessary to define it as one or the other. So, since it would be easier to get tomatoes into the country as a vegetable, the tomato was declared to be a vegetable (given that it was commonly eaten as one and nobody protested).

FRESH TOMATO AND CAULIFLOWER SCALLOP

1 large head cauliflower
1 tbsp. butter
½ cup chopped celery
¼ cup chopped onion
¼ chopped green pepper
¾ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. black pepper
¼ cup flour
2 cups milk
1¼ cups shredded sharp cheddar cheese
2 fresh tomatoes, sliced
½ cup bread crumbs

Preheat oven to 400. Spray deep 2-quart casserole with vegetable oil spray and set aside. Break the cauliflower into florets. Cook florets in medium saucepan, in 1 inch of water, covered for 5 minutes. Drain them and set them aside to cool.

In small saucepan, melt butter. Add celery, onion and green pepper, and saute until tender. Whisk in salt, pepper and flour (mixture will be crumbly). Slowly whisk in milk and cook, stirring, until thickened. Stir in cheese until melted; remove from heat.

Arrange half of cauliflower in prepared casserole. Cover with tomato slices. Top with remaining cauliflower. Pour cheese sauce over vegetables. Sprinkle top with bread-crumbs and spray lightly with vegetables oil spray. Bake at 400 for 25 minutes or until bubbly and hot. Serves 4.

WARM CHICKEN SALAD WITH TOMATO VINAIGRETTE

¼ cup oil-and-vinegar salad dressing
4 skinless, boneless chicken thighs or breast halves (1 to 1½ lbs.)
1½ cups diced plum tomatoes
1 large red onion, sliced ¼-inch thick (do not separate rings)
1 bag (10 oz.) mixed salad greens
½ English cucumber, cut in half lengthwise and thinly sliced

Pour ⅓ cup dressing over chicken; marinate 15 minutes. Pour remaining dressing over tomatoes and set aside. Preheat grill pan, broiler, or outdoor grill. Spray onion slices with vegetable cooking spray. Cook until tender, 8 to 10 minutes, turning once during cooking. Transfer to platter. Cook chicken 5 to 7 minutes per side or until cooked through.

To serve: Toss salad greens and cucumber slices and arrange on dinner plates. Slice chicken and arrange with onion slices over greens; top with tomato vinaigrette. Serves 4.

Professional chefs make some offering for holidays

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The Jewish National Fund staffer who thought up the idea for The Great Chefs of America Cook Kosher should have received a major pat on the back.

This spiral-bound cookbook offers recipes from well-known chefs, and popular eating establishments, adapted to kosher requirements. Each recipe has an indication as to whether it is pareve, dairy or meat, and a short biography of the chef. The designations are repeated in the index, a very helpful feature.

While some of the recipes are complicated, the instructions are straightfoward, and many ingredients are readily available.

And the urge to say nonchalantly that the meal is prepared a la Alice Aters of Chez Panisse in Berkeley California, or Wolfgang Puck of Spago, will be hard to resist.

DOVER SOLE POACHED IN VERMOUTH

From Chef Georges Perrier of Le Bec-Fin

2 tsp. butter for greasing
2 shallots, chopped
1/2 cup dry kosher vermouth
3 tbsp. butter
1 tsp. chopped chives
parchment paper
1 12-to-14-oz. Dover sole fillet, skinned
6 tbsp. kosher white wine
6 tbsp. fish stock
1 tsp. chopped parsley
salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 325.

Butter a shallow oven-proof baking dish and sprinkle the bottom with the shallots.

Season the sole with salt and pepper and place on top of the shallots. Add white wine, vermouth and fish stock and bring to a simmer on top of the stove.

When the liquid begins to simmer, cover the fish with buttered parchment paper, place the baking dish in the oven and bake for 10 to 15 minutes. Remove from the oven and transfer the sole to a heated platter and keep warm.

Reduce the liquid in the baking dish by half, whip in the 3 tbsp. butter, strain and blend with the chopped herbs. Drizzle the sauce lightly over the sole and serve. Serves 4.

JICAMA, MANGO AND WATERCRESS SALAD WITH PAN-ROASTED CUMIN

From Chef Allen Susser, of Chef Allen's

1 tbsp. cumin seeds
1 medium jicama, cut into julienne strips
2 tbsp. lime juice
1/2 tsp. salt
1 large mango, cut into julienne strips
1 bunch watercress, washed and dried
5 tbsp. peanut oil
1/2 tsp. pepper

Pan-roast the cumin seeds in a hot, dry saute pan for 3 minutes, browning them well.

Combine the mango, jicama and watercress in a stainless steel bowl. Add the toasted cumin seeds. Toss with the lime juice and peanut oil. Season with salt and pepper and serve. Serves 6.

Former Toronto director makes himself at home

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A Canadian who made aliyah 14 years ago is bringing his theatre company home from Israel.

The Nephesh Theatre's production of a romantic comedy, Make Yourself at Home, directed by Howard Rypp, is playing at Leah Posluns Theatre Sept. 17.

Before that, the comedy about an Israeli soldier who becomes accidentally involved with a Russian immigrant, plays for six performances in Winnipeg, starting Sept. 9 and in Sault Ste Marie, Sept. 14.

Though it has some Hebrew and Russian in it, Make Yourself at Home is played in English by its two Israeli actors, Eliran Caspi and Vicky Bahr.

"No one will have diffficulty in understanding the Hebrew and Russian," said Rypp, who is excited about bringing the Nephesh Theatre into the Leah Posluns Theatre for the first time.

"It is a comedy in the true sense but it has a serious underlying message about Israeli-Diaspora relations since the Israeli soldier, through the recent arrival from Russia, ends up learning things about his country he never appreciated before."

Make Yourself at Home has played for nine years in Hebrew all over Israel, and last year attracted 100,000 to its first performances in English in Israel. Its writer, Yitzchak Meshel, made aliyah from the United States many years ago.

Winnipeg-born Rypp, 43, lived in Toronto for 10 years where he founded Nephesh Theatre with lawyer Gordon Wiseman who writes under the pen name of Gabriel Emanuel. The latter's plays include Einstein and The Night Children.

Rypp is married to Beatrice, a Uruguyan-born Israeli, and they have three children. His wife is a playwright and actress who has appeared in Nephesh Theatre productions in Israel and written two of their plays.

Nephesh, headquartered in Tel Aviv, employs 38 actors, and in 14 years has mounted 14 different productions, running in repertory. They range over a wide variety of subjects but all, according to Rypp, have an underlying social message.

"Theatre in Israel today is alive and vibrant and Israelis are flocking to see good theatre," he said. "The only thing that would bring me back to Toronto, even temporarily, would be a chance to direct a truly, professional Jewish theatre."

Irving Berlin doc airs on Bravo!

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Irving Berlin has no place in American music. He is American music. That he defies simple categorization is a measure of his immense and unparallelled contributions to American culture.

The man and his music are showcased in a documentary The Life and Times of Irving Berlin on the Bravo! arts channel on Sept. 15 at 8 p.m.

This understated British film takes us from his birthplace in Russia in 1888 to his death in New York City in 1989 at the ripe old age of 101.

The son of a cantor, Berlin might never have left Russia had it not been for a pogrom that forced his family to flee.

Raised on the Lower East Side, Berlin gravitated toward show business, and worked as a singing waiter in a saloon.

Responding to the mood of the times, he wrote his first hit song, Alexander's Ragtime Band, when he was just past 20.

It was the first of a series of sensationally appealing songs, from Cheek to Cheek to White Christmas, which solidified his reputation as a peerless craftsman.

The film, which is graced by the presence of pianist/singer Michael Feinstein, claims that God Bless America, Berlin's alternative national anthem, languished in his drawer for 20 years before he finally released it.

Berlin, we learn, was an astute businessman who published his own music and owned the rights to all his material. He was also the proprietor of the Music Box, a Broadway theatre where many of his songs opened. He was, therefore, wealthy beyond his dreams.

Apart from writing for the stage, Berlin produced a medley of songs for popular movies, beginning with The Jazz Singer, the first talkie.

As he aged, he improved. For Annie Get Your Gun, a Broadway musical of the late 1940s, he wrote an unprecedented number of 10 hits.

Although he was a real trouper, occasionally appearing in productions in which his melodies figured prominently, Berlin was essentially a loner. And as time went on, he became a recluse, his daughter explains. She is one of several people who appear on screen to fill in some of the blanks about his personality and methods.

Though it is somewhat interesting, The Life and Times of Irving Berlin is only skin deep. Berlin, the person, remains an enigma, a cipher who never really comes alive.

We're told that he had a "giant ego," but no details are forthcoming. We know that his second marriage to a Christian evoked opposition in her family, but the matter is left hanging. We know that he was a consummate song writer, but we're given precious little information about anything else.

In short, the definitive cinematic biography about Irving Berlin has yet to be made. This one, certainly, doesn't deliver all the goods.

THE PRINCE OF EGYPT

DreamWorks' first full-length animated feature The Prince of Egypt is a retelling of the Moses saga, focusing on the two boys who grew up in Pharoah's court believing they were brothers.

The film features the voices of Val Kilmer and Ralph Fiennes as Moses and Rameses, "brothers" who are "torn apart by a secret revealed." The film also uses the vocal talents of Sandra Bullock, Danny Glover, Jeff Goldblum, Steve Martin, Helen Mirren, Michelle Pfeiffer, Martin Short and Patrick Stewart.

Dreamworks' Disneyesque offering is a musical with six new songs by Academy Award-winning lyricist Stephen Schwartz (Pocahontas) and a score by Academy Award-winning composer Hans Zimmer (The Lion King).

Look for three new CDs in record stores in the fall on the Prince of Egypt theme by such artists as Boyz II Men, Kirk Franklin and Jars of Clay. The music is a fusion of gospel, urban, r&b and inspirational. The Prince of Egypt opens Dec. 18.

Animated Antz: Speaking of animated films from Dreamworks, Toronto-born Larry Guterman was one of three directors to work on the upcoming release Antz, which features the voices of Woody Allen and a score of other celebs. A cinematic wunderkind only a few years out of film school, Guterman worked on Antz for two years at Dreamworks' Palo Alto studio under the overall direction of former Disney wizard Jeffrey Katzenberg.

Guterman is presently directing Curious George, a film that combines live action with animation, for Imagine Entertainment in association with Universal Studios. The producers are Ron Howard and Brian Grazell.

Antz, meanwhile, has been chosen as the closing film for this year's Toronto Film Festival. Guterman is expected to attended the screening at Roy Thomson Hall, Sept. 19, 8 p.m. If you see him, wish him happy birthday. He turns 35 on Sept. 22.

Cash Grants: The du Maurier Arts Council is inviting Canadian cultural organizations to submit applications for 1999 grants. Deadline for applications is Oct. 31 and notification of grants occurs in March 1999. Write to Ms. Celine Farndon, du Maurier Arts, 855 Irene St., Montreal Que. H4C 2P2.

Of the more than 400 grant applications received last year, the Council distributed $1.85 million to 215 applicant organizations.

Musical Dates: Acclaimed violinist Pinchas Zukerman joins the English Chamber Orchestra as conductor and soloist for an exclusive Canadian appearance at Massey Hall on Oct. 3. The program includes Bach, Neikrug and Beethoven. 872-4255.

Fans of American modernist composer Philip Glass, take note: The Philip Glass Ensemble & Voices are performing Monsters of Grace, a new digital opera in 3D by Glass, April 24 & 25 at Roy Thomson Hall. 872-4255.

Yiddish Scholar: Paul Glasser, a research associate at New York's YIVO Institute, speaks on The Development of Standard Yiddish, Sept. 12, 8 p.m. at the Workmen's Circle Bldg., 471 Lawrence Ave. W., Toronto. Guests $5.

Call For Stories: A phenomenon in the literary world, the inspirational and somewhat schmaltzy Chicken Soup For the Soul series of books has sold more than 20 million copies. Now founders Jack Canfield and Mark Victory Hansen are teaming up with Rabbi Dov Peretz Elkins of The Jewish Center in Princeton, N.J. to compile Jewish Chicken Soup for the Soul: 101 Stories to Open the Heart and Rekindle the Spirit.

The editors have the recipe but lack the ingredients, and so are calling upon the public for "Jewish" stories of universal appeal that can uplift the soul and perhaps also teach Jewish values, history and heritage to Jews and non-Jews.

Contributions should be "strong tales with a dramatic flair" up to 1,200 words in length. (See the website [www.DPElkins.com] for further details.) Authors of the 101 best submissions will receive $300 and, Elkins asserts, an important boost to their reputations as published authors once the book appears. "A percentage of profits from this book will go toward an important cause in Jewish education," Elkins says.

Vermont bicycle tour well worth the long drive

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SHELBURNE, VT. — Is it worth driving 1,356 kilometres for a cycling trip through the verdant hills and dales of Vermont?

If you've never cycled here, the answer may seem quite obvious. Why bother? But if you've enjoyed the simple, unadorned pleasures of a Vermont bicycle holiday, as I just have, the answer is clear. The drive from Toronto and back again is a relatively small price to pay for what awaits you in Vermont, surely one of the most unspoiled states in the United States.

Last month, I joined Bike Vermont's four-day Shelburne/Lake Champlain tour, its newest inn-to-inn trip. Over the next few days, I averaged about 55 kilometres a day, just enough to work up a satisfying sweat.

The pastoral countryside, framed by the silhouette of two ancient mountain ranges, was exquisite. I rode past deep forests bordered by a profusion of wildflowers, cornfields, apple orchards, ponds glinting in the sunlight, tidy farms dominated by silver silos, cows, horses and bison grazing contentedly, and rustic villages seemingly untouched by the ravages of time.

From beginning to end, the pace was leisurely. This was not a race but an idyll. Riding a multi-geared Trek touring bike, I often pulled over to admire achingly beautiful vistas, breathe in the fragrance of newly mown grass, clamber upon haystacks and watch bathers frolicking in the cool waters of Lake Champlain.

The tour, led by Claudette Bourque and Mark Young, both of whom are seasoned cyclists, attracted 11 riders ranging in age from their 20s to their 50s.

Apart from myself, they were all Americans, hailing from as close as Concord, Massachusetts and from as far afield as Ann Arbor, Mich. and Charlottesville, Va. Well-educated professionals, they were a friendly and accommodating lot.

The tour began at the Heart of the Village Inn in Shelburne, a quaint Queen Anne Victorian residence listed on the National Register of Historic Places. The innkeepers are Bobbe Maynes and Pam Pierce, who happens to be the sister-in-law of Frasier's David Hyde-Pierce.

After a hearty breakfast, I set off, a schematic map and typed directions in hand. Within an hour, the majestic Adirondacks came into view. Along with Katie Kellett, a lawyer-turned grant writer, I boarded the ferry on Lake Champlain for Essex, N.Y. The ride over was refreshing.

A sleepy burg whose commercial importance peaked more than a century ago, Essex contains an appealing ensemble of pre-Civil War buildings, and is dotted with a host of antique shops and art galleries.

Leaving Essex, I cycled to Charlotte, where I bought a sandwich and a drink for a planned picnic. Coasting blissfully down a hill, I crossed a covered bridge, one of the few left in Vermont, and found myself in a well-tended park overlooking Lake Champlain. After an enjoyable lunch, I returned to Shelburne for the night, dozing off with an issue of Vermont Life.

On the following day, I cycled with Lisa Hillson, a mortgage broker. The route was strikingly scenic, taking us into the village of Monkton, near Chester Arthur's birthplace. In case you didn't know, Arthur was the 21st president of the United States, one of the most obscure figures ever to sit in the White House.

From Monkton, we climbed, sometimes laboriously, a series of steep hills to the village of Monkton Ridge, lying in the shadow of the Green Mountains.

We eventually reached our lodging, the stylish Strong House Inn in Vergennes, whose proprietors, Mary and Hugh Bargiel, were recently named Vermont's innkeepers of the year.

Like the Heart of the Village Inn, Strong House Inn is a sedate refuge of hospitality. Using it as a base, I visited Button Bay, a magical spot filled with sail boats and cottages.

Fortunately for all of us, the weather always cooperated. While much of Vermont was drenched by record-breaking rain, we were treated to dry and invariably sunny days. They were perfect for exploring Middlebury, a charming town on the banks of Otter Creek, Vermont's longest river.

Middlebury, the epitome of a serene American town as Norman Rockwell might have imagined it, is justly famous for its arts and crafts shops in the Frog Hollow district.

Walk a few blocks north and you find yourself on the sylvan campus of Middlebury College, a first-rate

Disabled Montreal artist soars without limit

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although she is confined to a wheelchair, the spirit of Nechama Werner soars without limit beyond her ground floor Montreal duplex as she sits at her easel.

She was born in 1947 in Budapest and raised in Montreal. At the age of 36, Werner was hit by a massive stroke which left the mother of two totally paralyzed, unable even to swallow. She fought back and from her wheelchair, with a paralyzed left arm and limited use of her right hand, has become in the truest sense, an artist.

That she turned to painting is in itself remarkable. An Orthodox background did not expose her to art but something inside demanded that kind of release. At first, using acrylics and a palette knife, she tackled only one subject, Jerusalem's Western Wall. Over and over the ancient stones came to life on canvas — small, large, horizontal, vertical.

Nechama Werner moved on to semi-abstract works.

And this Wall which could be trite because it is so often reproduced, was somehow new each time — not a barrier but a hope, the tufts of green breaking through the fissures, suggesting eternal spring.

Eventually Werner moved on to semi-abstract works.

A seascape, peaceful pastel clouds high above turbulent waters in deeper tones, invokes respite rising from turmoil.

A strong autumn scene, all golds and greens and warm browns touched with burnt orange, is just waiting for someone to amble through.

From inside her home, Werner has also visualized and put on canvas, a garden, not an enclosed city strip but a wide expanse, bright with bloom.

She reaches past a circumscribed world, producing paintings of merit and depth.

Werner comes to Toronto for a Wine and Cheese Art Opening on Sept. 13 from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. at Early Canadian Furniture, 1599 Bayview Ave. (east side, two and a half blocks south of Eglinton). The exhibition, featuring a comprehensive collection of her paintings, continues through Sept. 20. For exhibition hours contact Early Canadian Furniture.

Sponsored by Early Canadian Furniture (owner Vim Kochhar) and the Canadian Foundation for Physically Disabled Persons, the show will be brought to Toronto by a friend of Werner, Inuit art dealer Miriam Berke.

Touring Ecuador and Galapagos

By GERALD SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

QUITO —Ecuador may be a relatively small country but it boasts a very impressive variety of landscapes and climates.

It is really three countries in one: the Amazon rainforest in the east (El Oriente), the Adean highlands (Sierras) and the tropical Pacific coast.

I arrived here via Houston and Panama City last June. Though El Niño had done some damage on the coast and to the Pan-American highway and rail line Riobamba-Guayoquil, the main tourist sites were quite accessible.

Quito, the second-highest capital city in the world (after La Paz, Bolivia) sits at an altitude of some 3,000 metres between peaks of the Andes, some capped with snow year-round.

Quito's old city was declared a World Heritage Site by UNESCO in 1978 and offers imposing colonial architecture and squares as well as great photo ops and people-watching.

Quito is a surprisingly cosmopolitan city with many European cafes and restaurants and yes, two bagel companies. The Museo del Banco opposite the U.S. Embassy is a beautiful three-level museum depicting the art and people of Ecuador in its pre-historic, colonial and modern eras with bilingual explanations (English-Spanish). The cathedrals of Quito are reminiscent of those in Spain.

Just north of Quito by public bus is El Mitad del Mundo — also known as the Equator at exactly 0 degrees latitude. You can take an elevator to a tower-lookout and walk down to ground level in an Ethnographic Museum showing the various regional and provincial (Ecuador has 23 provinces) groups and tribes in the country.

An additional few hours on the Pan-American highway and you reach the town of Otavalo with its hectic weekly market close by the Lago San Pablo and its typical lakeside villages.

The Galapagos Islands, some 1,000 kilometres west (2 hours by jet via Guayaquil on the Pacific) are for the serious naturalist and can be very expensive. Its attractions include the legendary tortoises, marine iguana, sea-lions and albatrosses.

As my 'exotic' adventure, I booked a four day trip to a jungle lodge in north-eastern Napo Province. Eleven of us flew over the Andes and jungle in a small Fairchild prop-plane and after a smooth 50-minute flight with great views landed at the village of Coca on the Napo River.

From there, a five-hour boat ride brought us to the Yuturi Lodge on a small tributary of the Napo which is in turn a tributary of the Amazon itself. The lodge and the setting were out of a movie set: thatched huts with hammocks on the porch, mosquito netting over the bed and wooden 'sidewalks' connecting the huts and dining room. A generator provided power for water and electricity at peak demand times.

For two days we took nature rides on the rivers and hikes in the selva (rainforest) on muddy paths, observing exotic flora and insects including the fascinating marching "Leaf-Cutter Ants of the Amazon." We visited the Isla de Los Monas (Monkey Island) with a rare species of this animal and a local shaman (healer) in his hut.

The people of Ecuador whom I met — urban and rural — were very kind, gentle and interested in other countries. I was invited to a weaver's home in the small village of Salasaca to observe indigenous ways and culture and attended an unforgettable summer-solstice ceremony in the local cemetery in the late afternoon.

Ecuador is a worthwhile and interesting destination and not too difficult to tour alone with patience and flexibility. Knowledge of basic Spanish is definitely helpful outside of Quito, as is a moderate degree of fitness. The best season is June to October.

There is a Consulate-General at 151 Bloor Street West, suite 410, Toronto (968-2077) and at least four different guide books solely devoted to Ecuador and the Galapagos. Or check this website.[www.ecuador.org/ecuador].

Vermont worth the drive

school renowned for its foreign languages courses.

Before I left Middlebury, I dropped into the local Ben & Jerry's ice cream parlor. Ben & Jerry's, a Vermont institution founded by two New York City boys, never disappoints and a tourist should savor its creamy treats.

That afternoon, I cycled to Kingsland Bay, a bucolic recreational area near Otter Creek.

On my last morning in Vermont, just prior to driving home to Toronto, I decided to cycle back to the starting point.

The one-and-a-half hour ride from Vergennes to Shelburne was relaxing. The day was splendid and the sights, as usual, were grand.

Could I have asked for more? I doubt it.

Bike Vermont offers inn-to-inn cycling trips lasting from two to six days between May and October. Bikes can be rented. For further information, call 800-257-2226, or write to Post Office Box 207, Woodstock, Vermont 05091.

Israeli kids excited about Neilson hockey camp

By REUVEN ROSENFELDER
Special to The CJN

METULLA — "The kids here are very eager. I believe it's a worthwhile project. For us, it's a nice kind of break."

For Roger Neilson, head coach of the NHL's Philadelphia Flyers, the project was the second consecutive summer hockey camp run under his supervision at the Canada Centre ice rink in Metulla. The kids were 56 Israeli and Canadian skaters, plus one from Harlem, New York, who participated in the hockey school.

As was the case last year, Neilson volunteered his services to the hockey program. He was joined in Israel by Alex Andjelik, a professional coach in Holland, goaltender coach Marshall Starkman, Jeff Budd, a Canadian who has worked frequently on the ice at Canada Centre, and Dainius Zubrus, a rising star with the Flyers.

Neilson was also accompanied to Israel by a producer from the TV program, NHL Cool Shots, who is working on a show on how NHL pros spend their free time.

"The program went great," Budd said. "There were no hitches. There was a good bonding between Canadians and Israelis."

Neilson was prepared to continue with the hockey school next year.

"Israel needs more ice rinks like this, in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Beersheva, so the kids will be able to play each other," Neilson said.

Ten-year-old Dudi Badler of Metulla comes to the Canada Centre arena three times a week and practises as a goalie. His mother, Michal, sees an enormous change in her son since he started to play hockey.

"It strengthened his self-confidence and independence," she said. "Hockey has become his major interest. He runs from school to the centre."

For 12-year-old Metulla native Oz Gino, Neilson "knows what drills to give us and he doesn't work us too hard."

Jenya Kogan of Kiryat Shmona, whose parents came from Moldova in the former Soviet Union, says simply, "it's fun."

One of the Israeli players, Ran Oz, who is now serving in the Israeli army, was invited by Andjelik to play professional hockey in Holland. Oz played one season with the Midget Marlies in Toronto before returning to Israel.

Among the camp's participants, 13 were from Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver. One skater, Deavon Wilson, plays hockey in Harlem. A connection was made through the Israel Experience Centre.

Hockey is a key component of the program, but not its only one. Lee Perlman of Melitz, an institute of Zionist-Jewish education in Jerusalem, coordinated travel, visits and talks designed to acquaint the older campers with Israel today.

"We are working to create an experience that will give participants a chance to meet not only around hockey, but to know themselves and others as Jews," Perlman said.

But there was no mistaking what motivated Sam Strasser of Toronto to come to Metulla. He decided to join his mother on a trip to Israel when he heard that Neilson would be running the camp. "His team is my favorite team," Strasser said.

Canada Centre is a major recreation complex in northern Israel, established with donations channeled to Israel by the United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada. It houses Israel's only Olympic-sized hockey surface.

The hockey camp was partially funded by UIA Canada as part of the Partnership 2000 program in northern Israel.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

איש ואישה ואיש מאת: סביון ליברכט, כתר הוצאה לאור, 1998

חמוטל, גיבורת הרומן איש ואישה ואישׁ, היא אשת איש, אם ועורכת כתב עת לפסיכולוגיה. אנו פוגשים בחמוטל בעת משבר כאשר היא מבקרת את אמה המאושפזת במחלקה הסיעודית. לבטי החיים בצל הזיקנה המתאכזרת והמוות הקרב הם נושא הספר. סביון ליברכט אינה מרחמת עלינו, הקוראים; היא חושפת את פרטי החיים במחלקה הסיעודית במלוא כיעורם. שברי אדם בלים מאכלסים את המחלקה; כאותו זקן, שפעם נשים יפות היו שוכבות לצידו, ועתה הוא הולך ומצטמק; שוכב מחותל, משותק במיטת גסיסתו. אמה של חמוטל, שפרה, הוזה הזיות של מין ומאשימה את האח התורן שהוא "מתגנב בלילה ומנסה להסיר בגדיה ונוגע לה איפה שאסור."

זהו הרומן הראשון של סביון ליברכט; עד כה פירסמה קובצי סיפורים. איש ואישה ואישׁ כתוב בסגנון עשיר וגמיש ועל אף הטיפול בחוויה הקשה של הזיקנה והמוות, הכתיבה זורמת והשפה בלתי מאולצת. ספר מאוד משכנע.

About families

Dear Susan,

My daughter, who is eight, is obsessed with the Spice Girls, as are her friends. They collect cards, stamps and music, and they mimic their dancing and singing. Should I be worried?

Dear Reader,

Not all that long ago, there was a group called the Beatles. Young girls (mostly teens) flocked to stores to buy their records and collect pins, cards or any other Beatle paraphernalia. They went to concerts and movies, and bought magazines in order to satisfy their Beatlemania. While many parents at that time were very concerned about the effects on their children, most of these kids grew into well-adjusted adults.

The Spice Girls are the Beatles of the '90s for preteenage girls. While their musical talents may fall short of the Beatles (although that could be the voice of age speaking), their social, emotional and psychological impact on this generation of preteens may be just as profound.

Preteenage girls are in the process of consolidating their female identity prior to confronting the challenges of adolescence and boys. They are learning and integrating skills that will prove invaluable as they attempt to master their world. They bond with their peers in order to develop critical interpersonal skills and sense of security. This emotional growth is a crucial step as they move into their adolescence.

Spice Girls represent a celebration of femininity that mirrors and validates the experiences of their fans. Like their preteen cohorts, they revel in dance, clothes and play acting, while finding emotional security in an all-girl world.

As adults, the Spice Girls represent women who manage their own careers and make their own creative decisions. They have clear goals and have systematically set out to accomplish them. Seeing the Spice Girls achieve their dreams gives young teens struggling to understand their place in the world a tremendous sense of empowerment. Now that's real girl power!

The sun rises on 5759

The day is about to dawn over the eastern horizon. The man stands facing the sun as its daybreak corona lights up the world.

Holding his prayerbook, wearing his tfillin, and wrapped in his tallit, he is connected to the traditions and customs of his kinfolk. He peers into the prayerbook. From the dignity of the man's posture, inclining toward the onset of the unfolding day, we may also reasonably presume that he is connected to the stirrings of his inner soul.

The photo suggests serenity; but there is hardly anything serene about tuning in to the stirrings of one's inner soul. It is a lifelong preoccupation, fraught daily with doubt and struggle. For we are called upon to reconcile competing curiosities and even contradictory systems of belief. And that is no simple task.

Editorial

Therefore, we must not regard as personal failure the self-doubt that generally accompanies the striving to know for certain what we are and what we were meant to be.

CJN columnist, educator and thinker Elliott Malamet has referred to that striving as "the hunger for something higher." At some point, Malamet says, we all must ask ourselves, "What do I want to do with my life? Can my life be sustained without a spiritual basis?"

Perhaps this time of year and the self-assessment it evokes can help us answer Malamet's questions.

Like the man in the adjacent photo, let us metaphorically face the sun as its daybreak corona lights up the year that is dawning, 5759.

At the very least, even without definitive answers to the ultimate questions, this time of year ought to remind us of our possibilities, namely, individual uniqueness, individual responsibility, inherent goodness and a sense of belonging to a people whose common past and common memories have lead to one divinely inspired purpose: helping to build a better world.

Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the entire world, who has granted us life, sustained us and brought us to this day.

CONGRATULATIONS!

A healthy, happy, peaceful New Year

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

A call to join 'brothers and sisters' in Israel

Ezer Weizman
President, State of Israel

Message from the president of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman.

Dear Friends,

During this past year Israel celebrated her 50th anniversary. Looking back, there was indeed much of which to be proud. Our country has grown and developed and has a thriving economy, a level of technology among the most advanced in the world, impressive scientific research, highly developed agriculture and a very cultural life. This, despite the internal and external problems we face.

Unfortunately, the much needed and longed for peace with all our neighbors has not yet been realized, but the peace process is still continuing. It is a very difficult and protracted process with many painful contentions, but all sides involved have too much to lose not to pursue it. I, therefore believe that eventually, we will attain the goal of living in peace with our neighbors.

During the past year we also justifiably celebrated the 50th anniversary of legal immigration to Israel. We have had great success in meeting the Zionist challenge of absorbing immigrants from all over the world, and Israel's population has increased tenfold to six million people since the country achieved independence. Unfortunately, not all our brethren in the Diaspora have chosen to realize the Zionist dream. At this opportunity, I once again, wish to call on all our brothers and sisters throughout the world to join us. Not only will you be strengthening our country, but you will also be ensuring the survival of your future generation.

May we, during the coming year, see the fulfilment of our prayers for peace and prosperity, and may we look ahead to an ever brighter future for Israel and the Jewish people. Shanah Tovah u'Gemar Chatimah Tovah.

'We need to re-establish dialogue'

Rosh Hashanah message from the president of Canadian Jewish Congress Moshe Ronen.

As the New Year 5759 approaches, we pause to examine our accomplishments and the new paths or directions that we must seek.

Our generation was shaped by the crucible of Auschwitz, by our people's battle for a homeland, by the State of Israel's ongoing struggle for peace and security, and by Canada's openness and pluralism. This year we celebrate and sound the horn loud on Israel's jubilee. We are at the dawn of a new millennium and renewed hope. We have accepted the torch of continuity passed on by those who suffered, sacrificed, strove courageously, and built anew. But as external threats lessen, we unfortunately have seen our internal divisions rise.

It is saddening, and indeed ironic, that we as Jews continue to struggle tirelessly for understanding and acceptance of others in our multicultural society, even as that same tolerance seems elusive within our own community.

There is no point denying that there is division among our people. As our brothers and sisters in Israel, so too, we stand divided on issues of religion, and even the peace process.

We may be divided by strong opinions, but we must present those in a civil tone and in the context of a united community. Yes, the Jewish community desperately needs bridge-building of its own. In-fighting and disunity always have led to hurtful and harmful consequences for us all. We need to re-establish proper dialogue, learn from one another, and reject intolerance and disrespect. We are all sisters and brothers: Am Yisrael – part of one family.

As we gather in synagogue during the High Holy Days, let us all pray for peace among our people and peace and security for Israel.

Moshe Ronen

May the New Year be a time for sweetness and warmth in Israel, the Diaspora, here in Canada and within our own Jewish community as well.

Rabbi helping with halachic issues at crash

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A member of Israel's police criminal identification unit joined Halifax Jewish clergy to help solve halachic issues arising from the Sept. 2 crash of Swissair Flight 111 off Peggy's Cove, N.S.

Rabbi Jay Levinson, who has assisted in post-crash identifications worldwide, was invited here by the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) to confirm Jewish deaths.

He was to interview those who last saw Jewish victims board the aircraft, and then testify before rabbinical courts in the United States to confirm the status of the widows.

Under Jewish law, a widow cannot remarry until it is proven beyond a doubt that her husband died. Otherwise, she is an agunah, and cannot remarry.

Rabbi Saul Aronov of the Beth Israel Congregation in Halifax said relatives of the deceased cannot observe mourning rites without confirmation of death. Only two of the 229 victims of the crash have been positively identified.

Recovery teams have been able to find only parts of bodies, not enough to bury under Jewish law.

"People want to get on with mourning rites and they can't do that," said Rabbi Aronov.

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the AJC, said there are so many halachic ramifications dealing with remains that rabbis have come to Halifax from New York and Israel "to help local authorities deal with proper burial procedures."

Earlier estimates of up to 50 Jewish victims have been scaled down to about 17, Goldberg said. "Relatives of 12 Jewish victims have come to Halifax and identified themselves to us."

Goldberg said families of Jewish victims felt they were treated very well. "We've heard only good comments."

A letter to the Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star in Halifax from Jonathan Cohen of Brookline, Mass., said, "I am especially proud that the small Halifax Jewish community has taken an out-front and active role in this effort. My personal thanks to all the area rabbis and community leaders."

The crash has been understandably traumatic for the families.

The Abady family of Toronto flew here last week. Their son George, 24, was the sole Canadian Jew to perish in the crash.

The family of Stanley Klein of New York discovered his empty tallit bag among items lifted from the Atlantic waters. Rabbi Mendel Feldman of the Halifax Lubavitch Congregation speculated Klein put on his tallit "and davened when the plane was going down, and he had no idea if he would live."

On Sept. 6, about nine people climbed the picturesque rocks near the rugged coast where the plane crashed. Relatives of Jewish victims chanted Hebrew prayers, many from the Book of Psalms.

On the same day, members of the Jewish community held a public memorial service at Beth Israel Synagogue, with more than 250 people in attendance.

"Human existence in the best of times is precarious," said Rabbi Aronov of the Orthodox congregation.

Toronto family mourns son

TORONTO — A Toronto Jewish family is in mourning for their son — the sole Canadian Jew killed in this month's crash of Swissair Flight 111 off Peggy's Cove, N.S.

George Abady, 24, was on his way to Geneva, where he studied hotel management.

His parents and only sibling, a sister, traveled from their north Toronto home last week to Halifax, where other relatives of the flight's 229 victims gathered for a memorial service and to be present in case remains were found.

Jon Goldberg, director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said Abady had to switch airlines at the last minute.

Abady's father drove his son to Buffalo to make the connection to New York, where he boarded Flight 111, Goldberg

The 'Greeners' Shul

An 8-year-old was too old to travel by stroller. Though it took his parents more than an hour to get to the synagogue, walking quickly, up hill all the way, he was determined to get there by his own strength. He knew he wouldn't be able to endure the taunts his sister was sure to rain down on his head. And he couldn't count on his parents for protection because they probably wouldn't understand what she was saying anyway. Most of all, he wanted to avoid the huge embarrassment of being seen in the stroller, being pushed to shul, just like a baby.

Shul was no ordinary place of worship. It was a YMCA in mid-Toronto that a group of determined newcomers converted into a synagogue for the High Holy Days.

The congregation was made up entirely of "greeners," men and women who had arrived recently in Canada within the last few years, all survivors of Hitler.

As far as the 8-year-old could tell, as far as the 8-year-old could understand, most of the people in that shul were not religious. But it was clear to him because of the uncommon unison of singing and sobbing that he heard in the shul, and because of all that he saw in his own home, that most of the people in that shul knew a lot about davening and probably too, about God.

His father sang in the choir. Altogether, there were three men in the choir along with the chazzan. None of the four, including the chazzan, were trained singers. But when they sang, they sounded like 10.

The harmony was generous and true, four different strands woven together into a strong, significant cord that all the daveners in the makeshift shul wanted to touch.

The chazzan, an old man even then, was the bass voice, the binding that secured their four-piece vocal bouquet.

One voice in the choir was a baritone, a deep, broad cloth of sound that gave the bouquet a velvet body.

Another voice in the choir was higher than the baritone, but not quite high enough to be a tenor, the stem that usually carried the melody.

The third voice in the choir, his father's, was the tenor, the definition in the harmony that gave color, feeling and poignancy to their rich sound. His voice was not slick or refined or operatic. It was simply beautiful.

Neither the chazzan nor the other choir members had any children. That might have been the reason during the few years his family attended the greeners' High Holy Day shul, that the 8 year old had been allowed to stand at his father's side whenever he wanted to. Usually it was as a break from playing in the halls with the other children who were also too young to sit still in the "sanctuary" or to want to.

When he wasn't involved in a hallway game, at his father's side was the very best place in the shul to be. He stood in front of his father, leaning his body against the chazzan's table, resting from the exhaustion of a game of tag.

His father always held him close, even while the choir sang, his gentle, tailor's hands resting, without admonition, on the boy's shoulders.

There were two moments in particular during the service when the youngster preferred being at his father's side to playing tag with his friends in the hall.

The first came during the repetition by the chazzan and the choir of the Musaf Amidah. It was the quietest moment of the entire service. The deep bass of the chazzan introduced the prayer: Unetaneh tokef k'dushat hayom ki hu norah v'ayom. (And we will now tell of the great power of this day's holiness; for it is both dreadful and stirring.)

The choir sang with their eyes closed. How they remembered the words, he never knew. He stood at the table, comforted by the warmth emanating from his father's hands on his shoulders, delighted to be at the centre of this four-cornered musical rectangle.

Suddenly, the choir stopped singing and the velvet voice of the tall baritone filled the silence of the hall: Uvashofar gadol yitakah. (And the large shofar sounded a resounding blast.)

The baritone was "answered" by the boy's father. His tenor voice pierced the quiet like a fine line of clear, thin light cutting darkness. V'kol demamah dakah yishama. (And a small still voice was heard.)

Pure and perfect, the phrase his father sang hung in the air until it vanished from sound and entered memory.

It was obviously a moving moment for the immigrant worshippers, for almost immediately after the tenor solo, they sang with one loud pleading voice the poetic refrain at the heart of their prayers: B'Rosh Hashanah yikatevun; uv'Yom Tzom Kippur yechatemun. (On Rosh Hashanah, our destinies are inscribed; and on Yom Kippur they are sealed.)

The second moment the boy loved came soon after the first when the kohanim blessed the congregation. To protect him from the harm that might result from looking directly upon the kohanim doing their priestly work, his father enfolded him within his tallit, hidden from danger.

Many years later, the man who had been that young boy could remember even the smell of the wool of his father's tallit. And of course, he also remembered, and missed, the feeling of his father's hands upon his shoulders.

Hate crimes often understated: police chief

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of hate crimes in Toronto is higher than official figures indicate, Police Chief David Boothby recently told the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region council.

"We believe the total of 187 hate crimes in 1997 to be understated," he said. "It doesn't tell the whole story. It doesn't tell of the serious consequences of hate crimes. A better indication of our concern is the extensive measures we are taking to combat it."

Boothby, the first Toronto police chief to appear before the community's Jewish leadership said, "There has to be a limit to what people have to say about another race. If it sounds like a hate crime to you and to me, it probably is."

He was accompanied by councillor Norman Gardner, police services board chair.

With regards to insensitive remarks by police officers, Boothby said that under a section of the Police Act, such remarks will be fully investigated, and new forms are in place for the complainant to state whether he is satisfied with the investigation.

Toronto's changing population, including immigrants who come from countries where law and order is not held in high esteem, is causing concern, he conceded, but the force is getting help from some of these communities.

The 18 hate crime units set up in the city are working well, he said, and are an expression of the force's new commitment to work with communities. More than 24,000 people in the general and school populations were given training in combating and recognizing hate crimes last year.

From left, Toronto Police Chief David Boothby; Police Services Board chair Norman Gardner; Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick; and CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy.

Policing the Internet, he said, is a new challenge, with its instances of child pornography, hate crime and fraud.

Citing an example of community cooperation, Boothby said automobile crime and thefts were reduced by 40 percent at Yorkdale shopping centre last Christmas after car owners were warned to beware.

Minority groups account for one-third of Toronto's population, he said. "Toronto has become the destination of choice for immigrants."

The force's campaign to recruit members of minority groups as police officers is doing "great," and he noted that the percentage of successful applicants from minority groups is the same as in the general population.

Igor Ellyn, vice-chair of the community relations committee, presented Boothby with a copy of A Coat of Many Colors by Irving Abella. "We will continue to be your partners," Ellyn said.

Jim Pott, Urban Alliance of Racial Relations came to hear Boothby's address.

In other business, Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive director, said that although $2 million (US) has been allotted to Canada from the settlement with Swiss authorities over Holocaust claims, the CJC has not yet received any money.

"We hope the payouts will be more liberal than allowed by the Material Claims Conference but nobody will be retiring early on the basis of what we pay."

He said the CJC Montreal and Toronto offices have been inundated with calls inquiring about the Swiss settlements.

"It was not on our agenda before, but it is now. It's a very complicated subject. I'm the most knowledgeable person on this matter, but I don't know anything."

He noted that the CJC was not a party to the class actions which resulted tentatively in a separate $2.5-million (US) settlement.

The interview with the Ontario education minister by a delegation seeking help for the operation of Jewish day schools was a "good step" said Attorney General Charles Harnick, a guest at the meeting.

By this time next year, the CJC's enhanced office in Ottawa will be set up, but the national office in Montreal is not closing down, as the CJC wants to keep an important presence in Quebec, reported CJC president Moshe Ronen.

It was the first regional executive meeting in a three-year term under the chair of new president Keith Landy.

End secrets on Wallenberg, Canadian researcher urges

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Only through full disclosure of all archives and records – whether in private or secret government files – will the world come closer to knowing what happened to Swedish World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg, a Canadian researcher says.

The fate of Wallenberg, who is credited with saving the lives of 100,000 Hungarian Jews in Budapest, is unknown, but is knowable based on existing documents, says Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas.

David Matas

The problem is that mountains of documents remain hidden or locked up, Matas says.

In a report released last week, Matas calls on several countries, including Sweden, Russia, the United States, Hungary and Israel, to open all relevant archives, even secret ones, in order to unravel one of the most enduring mysteries of the war.

"Neither privacy nor security concerns can justify a refusal to grant full disclosure of relevant information," writes Matas in a report that follows up on nearly two years of research into the Wallenberg case.

In 1996, Matas received a $5,000 grant from Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs to probe the fate of Wallenberg, who was taken into "protective custody" by the Soviets in 1945, and never heard from again.

Matas travelled to Riga, London, Stockholm, Moscow, Geneva and Washington; pored over thousands of documents; and interviewed dozens of officials and other researchers.

Matas, who specializes in immigration and human rights cases, concludes that given incomplete access to information, coupled with bureaucratic inertia, apathy and red tape, it is "premature" to come to any solid conclusion on Wallenberg's fate without more evidence.

For decades, the Soviets, and later the Russians, stuck to the same official story: that Wallenberg died in a Moscow prison in 1947.

Matas reports that the Swedish hero may have been shot and buried, poisoned and cremated, or died of a heart attack while under interrogation.

But Matas, as other researchers have before him, found evidence indicating Wallenberg was sent to different prisons and mental hospitals, and may have lived well beyond 1947.

In fact, given Moscow's contradictions and lies, it would be "a gross injustice" to assume Wallenberg is dead, Matas says. Further research "is a matter of utmost urgency because there remains the possibility, however remote, that Raoul Wallenberg is alive today," the reports states. If alive, Wallenberg would be 86.

In 1985, he was named Canada's only honorary citizen.

The scion of a wealthy family of industrialists, Wallenberg was dispatched from Sweden to Budapest by the U.S. War Refugee Board in 1944 to save as many Jews as possible from Nazi deportations. In the frantic months that followed, he issued up to 50,000 fake Swedish passports, and spirited their bearers to safe houses that flew the neutral Swedish flag.

Near the end of the war, he persuaded the Nazis to call off the razing of Budapest's Jewish ghetto, with its 50,000 inhabitants.

He was arrested by the invading Red Army as an American spy, and taken to Moscow, where years of obfuscation and lies began.

Matas bluntly states that the Soviets "were involved in fabrications, document destruction and obstruction that began with Wallenberg's arrest and continued almost to the end of the Soviet period."

Furthermore, today's Russia has "being less than cooperative in uncovering the truth." In Russia, Matas encountered intimidated witnesses, uncooperative officials and mountains of red tape. He believes it's all a throwback to the old Soviet system.

"The search for Wallenberg is a conundrum precisely because the Russians have done so little to clarify the Soviet past," writes Matas. "The Wallenberg case was a coverup within a coverup."

Evidence that Wallenberg survived past 1947 "is at least as compelling as the evidence that he was murdered in 1947," he argues, citing prison and hospital records, and interviews with former inmates of Soviet prisons who claimed to have had contact with Wallenberg, even into the early 1980s.

Matas believes that a famous 1957 memo signed by then Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko, stating that Wallenberg had died of a heart attack in 1947, was fabricated, and became the basis for "continuing and repeated lies by the whole Soviet apparatus."

In 1989, the Soviets handed over to the Wallenberg family some of the hero's personal effects, saying they turned up during routine cleaning of filing cabinets. But Matas dismisses that explanation, saying the items came from several different archives and could not have all been found by chance.

But Matas' frustration is not limited to Moscow.

He slams the Swedish government, which has "failed" to do everything it could to help Wallenberg. Following the war, Matas says, the Swedes returned Russian spies, but asked for nothing in return.

Raoul Wallenberg

In 1991, two working groups, one Swedish and one Russian, were set up to probe Wallenberg's fate. Both have yet to deliver their findings – a delay Matas says is "appallingly long."

If Wallenberg was murdered, his killers should be brought to justice before they have a chance to get away with "one of the great crimes of the 20th century."

Ultimately, while the responsibility for Wallenberg's disappearance rests "squarely" on the shoulders of Moscow, responsibility for uncovering his fate rests with the entire world, Matas states.

Among his recommendations are that:

- Canada should participate actively in the case and should call on all concerned governments to open their archives;
- There should be full archival disclosure of all information about Wallenberg in Sweden, Russia, the United States, Hungary, Germany, Israel and the United Nations;
- The Swedish and Russian working groups should complete their work and release their findings;
- Russia should establish a presidential commission into the fate of Wallenberg;
- Any claim that Wallenberg died, whether in 1947, or at any other time, must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

CJC president meets with Latvian Jewish leaders

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Prospects are improving for the return of a religious school, Tora V'derech Erec, to the Riga Jewish community, Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen said after recently returning from Latvia.

The three-story school building, estimated by Ronen to be worth between $1 and $2 million (US), is the subject of litigation by the community seeking restitution of the property, which was seized in 1940.

Thousands of Canadians are descended from Jews who lived in Latvia.

"The Latvians in general are quite good about restitution but they have been very slow on this and dragging their feet," said Ronen.

But the CJC president said he was heartened after a meeting with Gerald R. Skinner, Canadian embassy charge d'affaires in Latvia.

"The Canadian government is well respected in Latvia and the embassy's interest in the matter bodes well," Ronen said.

The CJC president was on private legal business in Riga when he was approached by Zalman Josse, the city's Jewish community president, to intercede. It was the first formal contact between the CJC and the Latvian community, Ronen said.

Following the meeting with Skinner, Ronen wrote a letter to Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy noting the school in question was a vital aspect of religious education until 1940.

As well, he wrote, the community has archival documentation and a certificate dated June 6, 1995 from Israel Meir Lau, the Chief Rabbi of Israel, attesting to its ownership.

Currently used by the Latvian Ministry of Education, the building will be re-dedicated to Jewish education if it is returned, community leaders told Ronen.

At present, Jewish classes are held in inadequate spaces in two locations in Riga, one of which is sponsored by Lubavitch, Ronen said.

The once-large Jewish community in Latvia today numbers about 8,000 to 10,000. Most are in Riga and many are assimilated, Ronen said. Instead of six synagogues in Riga before World War II, there is now only one.

"The whole issue of anti-Semitism in Latvia is still of concern. Not too much has changed," Ronen said.

Humanity, most high

Swissair Flight 111 from New York to Geneva fell to the ocean during the night of Sept. 2 with such deadly impact that as of this writing, almost two weeks since, only four bodies have been identified from the bits of human remains offered up by the cold Atlantic waters. And only a mere fraction of the total wreckage has been retrieved.

The scenes of grief and mourning from the picturesque shoreline of Peggy's Cove have touched us all, reminding us with each sorrowful sigh, that none of us is ever far removed from the sadness of a fellow human being.

But as deep as our feelings are of heartbreak, soaring high have been our feelings of homage and praise to the more than 1,500 people from the area surrounding Peggy's Cove who took part in the search, attempted rescue and salvage of the remains of that fateful flight.

From the very first terrible moments after they received news of the crash in the middle of the night, the local folk put comfort and self-interest aside for the sake of the humanity that they knew to be in distress.

Poignant stories of heart-rending sensitivity and compassion on the part of the local volunteers have poured from the crash site. As reported in the media, the attitude of John Butt, a medical examiner, typified that exceptional sensitivity. "People who are working with us in this difficult area cannot forget the beauty of the souls who suffered in the crash, and the families deserve nothing less than the sympathetic handling of the remains of their loved ones so that they can have some closure."

The small Jewish community of Halifax was also part of the humanitarian outreach. Indeed, as CJN Atlantic correspondent Joel Jacobson has written in this issue of The CJN, the response by the community was described by one particular family member of a crash victim as "out-front and active..."

And, it must be borne in mind, that outreach was exceedingly difficult. Few, if any, of the volunteers could have ever been prepared for what they saw "drifting into the rocks."

Helping the anguished mourners required extreme courage and fortitude. Lorraine Tobia, a member of the Shaar Shalom Synagogue and a nurse who worked 14- and 18-hour days to help the needy families, exemplified that fortitude. "In my business, I have seen many gruesome things...But [it] was nothing like what I saw here..."

In the kindness of these Nova Scotians, what we have seen is humanity at its very best, compassion at its highest, caring about another and not standing idly by the sadness of a fellow human being.

...and most low

In stark contrast to the deep goodness and high humanity of the people in and around Peggy's Cove, we saw standing in the prisoner's dock in Arusha, Tanzania, two days after Swissair Flight 111 crashed into the Atlantic Ocean, the surrealistic evil of humanity most low.

Jean Kambanda, the former prime minister of Rwanda was sentenced to life imprisonment for his role in the genocide of more than 500,000 Tutsi Rwandans in 1994. He was tried and convicted by the UN-established International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. It marked the first time that an international court had convicted anyone for the crime of genocide.

After the trial, Canadian prosecutor Madame Justice Louise Arbour noted that Kambanda's conviction and sentence "are the most significant steps to date in the eradication of the culture of impunity..."

We commend the tribunal for its diligent work.

If goodness, rather than evil, is ultimately to characterize humanity, those significant steps in Arusha must not be the last ones.

Arafat not responsible for Web site canard

A front page story (CJN, Aug. 13) and subsequent editorial dealt with a Fatah Web site posing a new constitution calling for the elimination of the State of Israel. We were greatly troubled by such a development and strongly condemned Fatah and more particularly Yasser Arafat since this totally contravenes the Oslo obligation that the PA/PLO recognize Israel's right to exist in peace and security.

Subsequently, however, news stories in both Ha'aretz and the Jerusalem Post strongly suggested that it was a small radical faction of Fatah – not Fatah itself – that was responsible for the activity. It would of course, have been helpful for Arafat to have immediately provided the necessary clarification and to have condemned those responsible, but it is important to recognize that there now seems to be no complicity in this story by the mainstream Fatah movement, the Palestinian Authority or Yasser Arafat. Arafat, who is by no means a saint, should be held accountable for those sins against Oslo for which he is responsible, and not for those which he had nothing to do with.

Defends editorial on Israel in Catholic Insight

Re: "Catholic magazine slams Israel," (CJN, Aug. 27).

Reporter Ron Csillag calls our editorial "a vicious attack" on Israel. It was neither an attack, nor "vicious," which the Oxford dictionary defines as: of the nature of vice, morally evil or injurious. It was an editorial reflection on the meaning and future of the State of Israel which commemorated its 50th birthday May 14.

I avoided attaching blame for these developments to either Jew or Arab. I concluded that Israel – as presently constituted – cannot survive, nor should it. In other words, there has to be a deep transformation in order to make this miraculous ingathering of Jews an expression of the Almighty's providence to the benefit of all.

Rather than wishing moral evil ("vicious attack") upon Israel, I wish it Godspeed.

I apologize for one or two remarks that could have been expressed more felicitously, and for the telegram kind of style of editorials in a limited space which tends to short-change an argument.

Applauds dialogue between Christians and Jews

I read with interest Ron Csillag's article (CJN, Sept. 3), concerning Rabbi Perry Cohen's efforts to create understanding among Christian communities regarding Jewish tradition and prayer. I would like to hear more about the result of his efforts; perhaps Rabbi Cohen is responding to a growing element among Christian communities interested in gaining a better understanding of the early roots of their own faith. If that is the case, then so much the better; no harm should come from keeping the road of dialogue open between Christians and Jews.

But why introduce references to what your reporter described as Rabbi Cohen's controversial past? Until I read your paper I was not aware of the controversy described and frankly, after reading it, I must say it seems to be a matter that is neither your business, nor mine, nor indeed that of any of your readers!

Claims thesis writer is David Irving follower

Re: University approves controversial master's thesis (CJN, Aug. 20).

The quotation, "No historian can prove formally that Hitler had the genocide of the Jews as a political objective," shows Pierre Asselin as David Irving's follower.

I recommend that he read Eberhard Jaeckel's, David Irving's Hitler – A Faulty History Dissected.

Not only has Jaeckel, professor of history at the University of Stuttgard (Germany), answered Irving's falsehoods, but also those of several others mentioned in Jaeckel's little book of 58 pages.

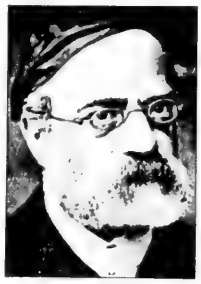
Prussian emancipation 'a sick swindle'

BY GIL TROY

One hundred fifty years ago last April, Prussia emancipated its Jews from centuries of legal restrictions. Impelled by the liberal democratic revolutions convulsing Europe, the Prussian constitution granted Jews full civil and political rights, despite their religion.

This grant of equal citizenship should have been a landmark event. But merely two years later, the Jewish historian Isaac Marcus Jost mourned that "the truly magnificent, lawful and virtuous uprising that brought admirable changes to our fatherland" had failed, and "all that followed was only a sick swindle."



Samson Raphael Hirsch

On one level, of course, the continuing scourge of anti-Semitism hindered emancipation. Of the 26 German states that debated or enacted emancipatory legislation in 1848 and 1849, only five states with a combined population of 12,000 Jews actually emancipated their Jews.

In Prussia, with its estimated 218,750 Jews (half of German Jewry), Article 14 of the revised constitution of 1850 revoked the equal status promised in Article 12. Article 14 declared: "The Christian religion shall be the prerequisite for [access to] all institutions of the state connected with religious observance." That meant that any positions requiring an oath of office, and any positions in the areas of education and culture, excluded Jews.

Issac Noah Mannheimer

For disappointed Jews, the swindle was even more unnerving. Not only had the backlash against the 1848 revolution robbed Jews of their new rights, the very act of emancipation forced Jews to choose between their people and their new "fatherland." The failure of the 1848 emancipation illustrates how 19th-century Jews – and their heirs – were mugged by modernity. These 150-year-old dilemmas about identity and loyalty, about tradition and change, continue to bedevil most modern Jews today.

Germans from across the political spectrum made it clear that "emancipation" required a Faustian bargain. Jews could only freely participate in modern life if they freed themselves from their traditions. The Jewish-born poet Heinrich Heine was correct; "the baptismal certificate" was indeed "the ticket of admission to European culture."

From the right, the Prussian Prince Ferdinand Radziwill announced in 1847 that "the doors are open all the time to complete emancipation. If they [the Jews] convert and assume Christianity, they will be our brothers in every way and will have civic and political rights." On the left, leading liberals sounded more reasonable. "The Jews must accept the hand being offered them," Count Renard insisted during the same 1847 debate in the Prussian Diet. "They may keep their faith, but they must put superstition and heresy away." Of course, to such "enlightened" folk, most Jewish traditions appeared superstitious and heretical.

The leading German Jewish parliamentarian, Gabriel Riesser, justified the bargain in tactical terms. German national liberation would liberate the Jews too. "Offer me with one hand the emancipation to which all my innermost wishes point, with the other the realization of the most beautiful dream of the political unity of Germany in union with its political freedom," he said, "and without hesitation I choose the latter! For I have the firm, deepest conviction that the latter contains the former."

But the elite Jews' zeal for reforming tradition was more than a mere tactic. By 1848, thousands of what Riesser called "Germans of the Jewish faith" had already liberated themselves from their past. The very formulation, "Germans of the Jewish faith," negated the centrality of Jewish nationhood to Jewish identity, and reduced Judaism from a complex, three-dimensional national, religious, and moral adventure into a unidimensional creed. Enlightened German Jews were busily freeing themselves from kashrut, Shabbat and other "ballast of an age gone by" that kept the Jews outside of the modern mainstream.

"Jewish matters naturally fall in the background; they don't fit this world," exclaimed Jost. "Whenever I run into people from the synagogue, I think I'm seeing ghosts from the Middle Ages."

The German Jewish elite had eagerly embraced the modern world. These liberal Jews had their priorities clear. "For us? Nothing!" Vienna's Rabbi Isaac Noah Mannheimer shouted above the din of revolution on March 18, 1848. "Everything for the nation and the fatherland... Now, nothing for us! No word of Jewish emancipation, if others don't speak it for us... First the right to live as men, to breathe, to think, to speak; first the right of the citizens, afterwards comes the Jew."

For over half a century, German Jews had been busily dismantling an edifice constructed over 4,000 years. Beginning with Moses Mendelssohn, the brilliant maskil (enlightened one) and star of 18th-century Berlin salon life, Jews ambitious to enter the modern world "as men" had jettisoned the practices that made them Jews.

The transformation was rapid and disorienting. Mendelssohn devoted his considerable intellect to making modern life palatable to traditional Jews and making traditional Judaism palatable to modern Germans. But opening the Pandora's box of enlightened thought, social ambition and universal idealism was dangerous. Like millions of Jews since, Mendelssohn struck a balance that worked for him, but he failed to pass his idiosyncratic formula onto the next generation.

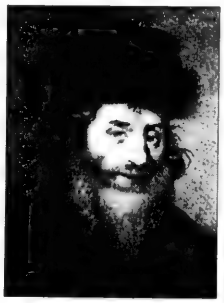
"We have educated you and your brothers and sister in the Christian faith, because it is the creed of most civilized people," Moses' son Abraham Mendelssohn wrote to his 15-year-old daughter Fanny when she was confirmed in the Lutheran church in 1820. "By pronouncing your confession of faith you have fulfilled the claims of society on you, and obtained the name of a Christian."

Moses Mendelssohn

While the story of this offshoot of the Mendelssohn family tree was an extreme case, it was a harbinger of things to come. The formula of "First... to live as men... afterwards comes the Jew" led Jews to Reform Judaism by applying non-Jewish standards.

"Why should we not draw a lesson from the peoples among whom we live," one Reformer asked, justifying modelling Jewish liturgical life on the practices of the German Lutheran church. In constructing elaborate temples, clothing rabbis in ministerial robes, using German instead of Hebrew, and playing an organ during the service, Jews mimicked the contemporary Christian burghers whose approval they craved.

These departures were so bold that they triggered an intense counterreaction. Facing the Reformers' unprecedented threat, traditionalists became obsessed with fighting change. Even Samson Raphael Hirsch, who founded "Neo-Orthodoxy" to preserve the religious framework while operating in the modern world, cried: "Only if, as in the days of our ancestors, we gird ourselves with swords can we today, on a rubble-covered field with enemies lurking all around, hope to advance the building of our sanctuary."



Moses Sofer

This rejection of change, this embrace of an "Orthodoxy," was in itself novel. Jews had traditionally described Jewish law as an Eitz Chaim, a tree of life that does indeed grow, albeit gradually, imperceptibly. All of a sudden, no change was acceptable.

"Never say, 'Times have changed!'" the great Rabbi Moses Sofer – the Chatam Sofer – who died in 1839, warned in his ethical will. "We have an old Father – praised be His name – who has never changed and never will change."

The liturgy, the siddur, eloquent testimonials to the wealth, diversity, continuity and fluidity of Jewish life over the centuries became etched in stone. "The order of prayer and synagogue shall remain forever as it has been up to now," the Chatam Sofer decreed, and no one may presume to change anything of its structure."

Looking back, it is tempting to dismiss the Reformers for being too wobbly, and the Orthodox for being too rigid. But the rise of Orthodoxy reveals just how profoundly revolutionary the modern impulse was – it even transformed the traditionalists.

And we moderns should be especially wary of dismissing these hyper-patriotic, eager to be accepted, German Jews. True, most readers of The CJN are too well-trained, and too immersed in the rhetoric of Jewish unity and self-sacrifice to echo Rabbi Abraham Geiger's 1840 sentiments that "it is more important to me that the Jews of Prussia can become druggists and jurists than that all the Jews of Asia and Africa, in whose fate I am interested as a human being, have or have not achieved salvation." But we can afford to relax because we have already become a community of "druggists and jurists." Besides, haven't millions of North American Jews today sacrificed their communal identities for professional advancement? Don't most of us choose modern indulgences over Jewish tradition?

Similarly, while in a post-Holocaust world, Riesser's vow that "the Jews will be Germans among the Germans" sounds deluded and pathetic, don't we, too, revel in our status as a model minority? Aren't we quick to strike anyone who dares to question our loyalty to our country of origin?

Ultimately, most of us try to live our lives "first as men" – or women – and only then as Jews. The short unhappy life of the 1848 Prussian emancipation should push us to look deep inside ourselves, assess our safer and more welcoming surroundings, and double-check that we make identity choices freely and intelligently, and not in response to some fear that we too will not be accepted. If we, unlike our 19th-century ancestors, are truly emancipated, our freedom should not be contingent on anyone's goodwill, or our communal good behavior, but on our inherent rights as free citizens.

Opinions

On bullets and ballets

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Behind Benjamin Netanyahu's recent attack on former chief of staff Amnon Shahak lies a tale of shrewd political manoeuvering. However, it also marks the latest and most serious stage in the shifting relationship between the political and military branches in Israel. In a recent press conference, Netanyahu described Shahak as a "leftist" and criticized his role as chief negotiator with the Palestinians during Yitzhak Rabin's government.

Like Ehud Barak and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai before they joined Labor and Likud respectively, Shahak, who left his post just a few months ago, is perceived as credible and as a political centrist. His greatest asset is the pragmatism and non-partisanship associated with most senior commanders in the IDF. As soon as Netanyahu took office, he viewed Shahak as a potential political threat, but from the start, his personal criticism has been framed as an attack on the credibility of the IDF's decision-making process.

In spite of the military's great power, Israeli democracy has remained immune to the danger of a military coup, largely due to the unique nature of the Israeli "people's army" and the harmony that traditionally existed between the civil and military authorities. The peace negotiations during the 1992-96 Rabin government changed this historical situation. Rabin's reliance on the professionalism of the IDF led him to appoint military officers as key figures in the peace talks, thereby exposing them to attacks from opponents of Oslo on the right.

After the 1996 election and Netanyahu's rise to power, the rift became open and acute. In an unprecedented break with common practice, Netanyahu did not meet with his chief of staff for months, and he and members of his cabinet repeatedly questioned the professionalism of the army's leaders.

The IDF, in turn, felt the need to protect itself from being blamed for policy mistakes. For the first time in Israel's history, the press became the arena for open disagreements between political and military leaders over policy on issues such as withdrawal from Lebanon or dealing with Palestinian unrest in the West Bank.

Dr. Yoram Peri, who has followed the role of the military in Israeli society for decades, views the new status quo as dangerous. According to Peri, a young democracy, which is dependent on the IDF for its security, cannot afford the current alienation between the civil and military authorities. The army believes that it is being unfairly criticized for a political bias that does not exist, by politicians who have little regard for the exigencies on the ground in the territories. The current tension between the two branches could worsen in the event of hostilities in the West Bank. The IDF knows that half the people, and many reserve soldiers, may disagree with a government decision to move back into the West Bank cities in the event of such an outbreak.

In Israel's polarized society, the public is seeking an answer that appears to bridge the gap between right and left. To capitalize on this, Tel Aviv mayor Roni Milo is trying to run for prime minister as head of a new centre party, and this is why Shahak is the latest political star. He projects empathy and intelligence, and has not yet declared his political views. His star may wane once he is tested in the front line of politics, but right now, he is perceived as the answer to Labor's difficulties in presenting an effective challenge to Netanyahu. That is why it was so important to Netanyahu to brand Shahak as a "leftist," thereby trying to damage his credibility with voters in the centre.

The episode is also illustrative of a deeper problem in the Israeli political culture. The army is one of the few sources of newcomers to politics. In Israel, even today, a military career is worth more than many civilian achievements. By definition, this makes it more difficult for other groups, especially women, to break through the glass ceiling that exists. But it also parachutes into politics a cadre of men who sometimes have great difficulty with the open, competitive nature of the political arena.

The history of Israeli politics is littered with more former generals who failed in their political pursuit than the few who succeeded, like Yitzhak Rabin, Moshe Dayan or Ariel Sharon. For many observers, the automatic infatuation with "military politicians" is one of the negative dimensions of a society that needs to become more civilian in its orientation.

As for Shahak, he is still enjoying a media and public honeymoon, during which he has said very little but has looked very good. Netanyahu's political manoeuvre may marginalize him, but if he fights back effectively, it may mark the trial by fire of the newest star on the Israeli political horizon.

Is circumcision wrong?

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

For some time, Dr. Margaret Somerville of McGill's Centre for Ethics, Medicine and Law has been part of a movement opposing the practice of routine male circumcision. She argued in the Montreal Gazette of Aug. 22 that the procedure is harmful, not medically justified, and takes place without a baby's consent. She suggests further that male circumcision may well qualify as criminal assault. From this follows her claim that "it is ethically wrong" for a physician to carry it out. While she recognizes that religious circumcision – for Jews and Muslims – is a separate case, she nevertheless hopes that somehow religious leaders may be convinced to change their views. Jews are understandably concerned.

Before looking at the scientific merits of the issue, it is worth pondering why it has emerged for public debate at this time. One possible factor may be subtle or not so subtle pressure from radical feminists, relating to the issue of female genital operations (FGO). The evidence about the serious harm of those horrific procedures is overwhelming, far greater than any evidence regarding male circumcision. The mobilizations against FGOs are more than justified.

But some activists might see elements of sexism and racism in the hue and cry against FGOs, practised by and on women of color. Why does a practice common to (many white) men escape comparable criticism? To avoid a charge of a possible double standard, there may be pressure on feminists and/or physicians opposed to FGOs to consider condemning male circumcision as well.

Does the medical evidence justify such condemnation? I am neither a physician nor a rabbi. But let me stress that if there were clear scientific proof that male circumcision was causally linked to serious illness or dysfunction, this layman would urge Jews immediately to either abandon the practice or develop a symbolic substitute. And I believe that such a change would be sanctioned by Halachah (Jewish religious law).

Somerville cites the exhaustive 1996 review by the Canadian Pediatric Society (CPS), which I have read. Their conclusion is that on balance, the benefits do not outweigh the risks and thus circumcision should not be "routinely performed." But this neutrality seems far removed from criminal assault. Indeed, the two "overall assessments" (Lawler, Bisonni and Holtgrave, 1991, Ganiats, Humphrey, Taras et al 1991,) cited by the CPS agree that the medical and financial advantages and disadvantages of circumcision cancel each other out.

Moreover, I am unaware of reports of an increasing number of cases of penile-related illness or dysfunction among the circumcised which would suggest new scientific evidence of adult harm. Nor is there any evidence that Jewish men – a naturally occurring experimental group – have displayed epidemiological evidence, historically or at present, of any adverse health impact from circumcision.

Somerville's case rests largely on harm to the infant being circumcised. She indicates that this is a painful procedure, and that "some evidence" suggests it may disrupt breast feeding, or that "trauma to a child can interfere with mother-child bonding." These issues and the evidence were not investigated in the CPS report.

I have not reviewed this latest evidence. There may be a brief disruption of breast-feeding schedules. But I wonder if that is related to any evidence of malnourishment or lower birthweights for circumcised babies. If such evidence exists, along with similar evidence regarding Jewish infants, it should also lead to other observable consequences, such as higher infant mortality or morbidity rates.

As for "trauma to a child" I wonder if those studies used circumcision as their example of trauma. Circumcision lasts a few seconds and infants do not generally have any memory of the event. By contrast, most cases of child abuse usually involve chronic and multiple behaviors. I doubt if there is scientific evidence of a weaker mother-son bond among Jewish boys or men, which would be a natural confirmation of such alleged effects.

In short, I am not persuaded that any significant harm is done to circumcised infants, on balance. As to consent, little girls get their ears pierced and infants are strapped into bicycle rear seats, all without their consent…

There is no doubt that criticizing circumcisions can make Jews feel labelled as uncaring or primitive. Individual doctors can decide not to do them. But in the absence of convincing scientific evidence about real harms – as is the case with FGOs – there is no hope that identified Jews will stop circumcising their infant boys. Pushing the issue will create needless cultural conflict.

Our ageist society

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Just 30 years ago, Robert N. Butler created the words ageist and ageism. For readers unfamiliar with this terminology, ageism means prejudice towards the aged. Butler showed that, without a question, the old in North America are exposed to a great deal of prejudice – in language, social policy and popular attitude.

Says Butler: "Ageism manifests itself in a wide range of phenomena on a variety of levels: stereotypes and myths; outright disdain and dislike or simple subtle avoidance of contact; discriminatory practice in housing, employment and service of all kinds; epithets, cartoons and jokes. At times, ageism becomes an expedient method by which society promotes viewpoints about the aged in order to relieve itself of responsibility towards them. At other times, ageism serves a highly personal objective, protecting young (usually middle-aged) individuals from thinking about things they fear."

A few years ago, another researcher, Frank Nuessel, provided an eye-opening dictionary of ageist terms: Nouns – bag, battle-axe, biddy, codger, coot, crone, fogy, fuddy-duddy, geezer, goat, hag, little old lady, spinster. Adjectives – crotchety, doddering, grumpy, infirm, rickety, toothless, withered, wrinkled.

Of course, some of these words are perfectly acceptable in a neutral context, but when describing older people they become ageist terms. Aged or old are commendations when applied to wine, but not when applied to persons — not today anyway.

Positive terms exist as well, though in comparison they are relatively few: experienced, mature, mellow, sage, seasoned, veteran, well-versed, wise. Elder is pretty safe from verbal abuse, for the time being anyway. Generation gap was an objective description of age difference when it was first used but quickly became a put-down, suggesting that the older party lacked a proper understanding of the young (of course, not the other way around).

Discrimination is usually reserved for minorities, and in that sense old people have been called a minority, though that ascription has not been deemed proper by others. The problem is compounded by the fact that prejudicial terms can be found, not only in the media, but in also in children's books and school texts. We have been reasonably successful in cleansing our language of racist epithets and of geographic identifications that are no longer acceptable, but no comparable effort has been made to alert decent folk about the pernicious affect of using ageist terms. It's time we tried.

Unless we are stricken by debilitating disease, we are quite unwilling to be cast on the societal ash heap of unusable antiques, and be talked about accordingly.

Jewish tradition is quite firm on this whole subject. It demands that we rise before the old, and respect the aged. Unfortunately, all too often, we too follow the attitudes prevalent in our environment. We could and should do better.

Rabbi Plaut is presently working on a new book that he entitles tentatively: Being Old — A View from the Inside.

The Kirshner File

Neil Caplan: leading Canadian authority on Mideast

In this age of pop culture, you're more likely to have heard of the Spice Girls than Neil Caplan. But in the rarefied realm of Middle Eastern scholarship, Caplan's name evokes widespread acknowledgement and respect.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Being modest, he describes himself as "an independent researcher who enjoys some credibility and a small reputation" among Middle East specialists. In actuality, Caplan, a 52-year-old political science professor in the humanities department of Montreal's Vanier College, is a top-notch scholar who gives new meaning to the hoary phrase "publish or perish."

Since 1978, he has written seven assiduously researched books and numerous monographs on the intricacies of the Arab-Israeli conflict. By doing so, Caplan – the son of Nat and Mary of Cote St. Luc - has become one of its leading Canadian authorities.

A 1966 McGill graduate, Caplan burst upon the scene with Palestine Jewry and the Arab Question, 1917-1925, a book based on his PhD dissertation at the London School of Economics and Political Science.

Supervised by the late Elie Kedourie, Caplan's thesis offered a microcosm of the attitudes, situations and patterns which crystallized into enduring features of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Palestine Jewry and the Arab Question galvanized him to produce a series of related books, mainly under the umbrella title of Futile Diplomacy, about the efforts by Jewish and Arab leaders to reach a modus vivendi in strife-torn Palestine.

The first volume, entitled Early Arab-Zionist Negotiation Attempts, 1913-1931, was followed by Arab-Zionist Negotiation Attempts and the End of the Mandate and The Lausanne Conference, 1949: A Case Study in Middle East Peacemaking.

These works, in turn, spawned The United Nations, the Great Powers and Middle East Peacemaking, 1948-1954 and Operation Alpha and the Failure of Anglo-American Coercive Diplomacy in the Arab-Israeli Conflict.

Caplan's latest book, published several months ago in collaboration with Laura Zittrain Eisenberg of Carnegie Mellon University, is Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace: Patterns, Problems, Possibilities (Indiana University Press).

The writing of these books, which Caplan calls a "lifetime project," has required him to be on an endless paper chase.

As he put it: "I love digging up original documents buried in various archives around the world, and reconstructing the historical puzzle of the Arab-Israeli conflict by carefully piecing together what I think is a more reliable and balanced account of what happened and why people acted the way they did."

Insofar as methodology is concerned, Caplan rigorously sticks to the facts. "Unlike the so-called 'new historians' or revisionists," he explained, "I try to avoid discussions of what might have or should have been, an approach which is usually ideologically driven."

Caplan, however, has a distinct point of view, as a reading of his newest work, Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace, confirms. Two examples will suffice:

• "Zionism focused on Palestine but largely overlooked the Arabs already living there, seeing them as residents of the larger Ottoman Empire but not as a Palestinian national people.

• "As Jewish immigration and settlement increased, so did Arab opposition. The willingness of many Arab landowners to sell property in Palestine to Jews persuaded many Zionists that the Arabs would eventually reconcile themselves to the establishment of a Jewish state..."

Caplan contends that, notwithstanding the inherent irreconcilability of their respective aims, leading Zionists and Arabs met informally on dozens of occasions to thrash out differences. And he points out that direct Arab-Zionist contacts were in and of themselves not considered the breakthrough they seem today.

None of the talks that took place between Zionist and Palestinian Arab representatives from 1919 onward were aimed at achieving "a mutually satisfactory solution," Caplan contends.

Until the 1948 War of Independence, the political issues which dominated their discussions turned on immediate practical concerns like Jewish immigration and communal representation in self-governing bodies.

Looking back at the cumulative negotiating experience of Jews and Arabs over the past 80 years, Caplan reaches several conclusions:

• Jews failed to appreciate the legitimacy of Palestinian Arab national sentiment and aspirations.

• Arabs failed to recognize the legitimacy of Zionism and the Jewish yearning for a homeland.

• The selfish interests and machinations of third parties, notably that of France, Britain, the former Soviet Union and the United States, undermined the chances for Arab-Jewish reconciliation.

Contrary to popular belief, he goes on to say, the record also shows that merely increasing the amount of contact between the two sides did not necessarily increase the chances for successful talks.

Caplan, a graduate of Baron Byng High School who is married with two grown children (Benjamin and Hanna), has been drawn to Middle East issues since the 1967 Six Day War.

"My interest in Middle Eastern studies evolved through three phases," he said.

Neil Caplan

Before the Six Day War broke out, he was in the middle of an MA program in Canadian studies at Carleton University in Ottawa. "As a Jew, I found myself a news junkie, emotionally drained by reports of the buildup to war. I began to identify with endangered Israel, and sensed a looming threat through the lens of the Holocaust. Like most Jews, I was filled with joy and relief at Israel's lightning victory."

The second stage of his interest drew upon the Canadian, rather than the Jewish, component of his identity.

"The mid-1960s were a time of intense introspection about the nature of the English-French partnership that made up Canada. I thought, at that time, that Canadian-style federalism might perhaps offer pointers toward a structural solution to the Arab-Israeli dilemma, and I applied to to do graduate work in Middle Eastern studies with such a thesis in mind."

During the last stage, in England, Caplan studied under such pre-eminent Middle East scholars as Bernard Lewis and P.J. Vatikiotis.

"I also took courses to beef up my Hebrew, and learned some Arabic." As well, he accepted a fellowship at Tel Aviv University's Moshe Dayan Centre for Middle Eastern and African Studies.

At Vanier College in the 1970s and 1980s, Caplan taught courses about the Middle East. In recent years, though, he has moved on to more Jewish-content courses turning on the Holocaust and "Jewish world views."

Caplan plans to spend the 1999 academic year at the Hebrew University, where he intends to study four peacekeepers and peace-makers: Count Folke Bernadotte, Ralph Bunche, Gen. E.L.M. Burns and Dag Hammarskjold.

Although he is not an avid newspaper reader, Caplan follows current Mideast developments closely. In general, he is optimistic that the Arab-Israeli dispute can be resolved through peaceful means.

"But in how many years? And after how many more deaths?

"I believe that any settlement, to be a lasting one," he added, "must lead to some form of (Palestinian) statehood that is both acceptable to the Palestinians and answers Israel's basic security needs."

Jews*, by Arthur Hertzberg and Aron Hirt-Manheimer (Harper Collins, $36.50).

This provocative and outspoken work on Jewish identity through the ages will, undoubtedly, arouse debate and even anger.

Arthur Hertzberg is the well-known Conservative rabbi, scholar, prolific author and essayist, prominent Zionist and former president of the American Jewish Congress. His collaborator, Aron Hirt-Manheimer, is editor of Reform Judaism magazine.

The authors project three basic themes or paramount ideas. The first of these is that Jews have aroused antagonism and opposition throughout history because they have been persistent dissenters in every society in which they have lived. "From the very beginning, when Abraham broke the idols of his father, Terach, he insisted that the faith in the one God is true and paganism is false. He challenged the culture around him.

"When the Jews encountered Hellenistic culture after Alexander the Great conquered the Near East, Jews were the lone dissenters. When Christianity became the state religion of the Roman Empire, the Jews refused to accept the new dispensation. In medieval Europe, nobody would have doubted even for a moment the divinity of Christ, until a Jew showed up."

So what is anti-Semitism? It is the fierce antagonism of the majority against a small people whose astonishing existence keeps calling their major beliefs into question.

Secondly, contend the authors, Jewish stubbornness and separateness flow from a belief in being divinely chosen for a singular role or mission in history.

"Even many Jews who have spent their lives outside the Jewish community have not shaken off this notion of being part of an elect people. It was bred into their bones by their ancestors, who were sustained in all their travails by the unshakable faith that God had chosen the Jews as a "kingdom of priests and a holy people." This biblical definition – that Jews have a special destiny – is at the very core of the self-image of Jews."

Did God, indeed, choose the Jews? The authors seem somewhat unsure. They speak of divine selection, yet they write, "It is not the belief that God chose the Jews that has kept us going. Abraham did not begin his journey because God suddenly appeared and said to him, I have chosen you and your descendants to be my special messengers of earth. On the contrary. Abraham first chose God by breaking the idols of his father, Terach; that is the driving impulse of Jewish existence.

Evidently, for the authors – chosen Jews or choosing Jews – it doesn't really matter. What is basic is that from ancient days, Jews accepted this role and its commanding imperatives.

Of course, choseness does not impose moral, spiritual, or intellectual superiority – or privilege. "The prophet Amos echoes this assessment in the name of God: Only you have I known from among the nations of the earth. But you are no better to me than the children of the Ethiopians (9:7). Amos defined choseness, not as merit but as responsibility, even as an affliction."

Finally, the authors assert that known conformity and choseness impose the need for righteous behavior. God expects Jews to live intensely, creatively, decently, in the moral vanguard of humankind. This includes the behavior of the state of Israel to its Arab minority, despite the actions and beliefs of some of the ultra-Orthodox and the ultra-nationalists.

Most of the book's popularly written text consists of brief, informative biographies of prominent Jews throughout the ages who have defied the conventional or prevailing mores of the time.

The book concludes with these inspiring words. "To be a Jew is to believe in tikkun olam, that the world can be redeemed. To be a Jew is to be carried by the current of the ancient Jewish river that keeps on flowing. The journey will continue."

Jews and their journey

Chassidic holiday stories

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Over the past few weeks, I have looked at some of the sophisticated Web sites created by various chassidic communities. One of the central elements shared by all Chassidim is the importance of stories and storytelling in passing on core beliefs, codes of behavior and of course, the ways of the rebbe.

As we approach the Yamim Nora'im, the Days of Awe, we could do no better than to emulate these tzaddikim and attempt to walk in their footsteps. Today: chassidic stories on the Jewish Highway.

For a lovely introduction to the power of stories and storytelling, I highly recommend Rabbi Eliahu Klein's About the Legends of the Baal Shem Tov [http://www.storypower.com/hasidic/articles/klein_intro.html].

Rabbi Klein has not only written an essay about the chassidic masters, he has put together a touching essay about his personal experiences with everyone from the Ger, Satmar and Lubavitcher rebbes to Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and Elie Wiesel.

A large compendium of tales can be found at the Archives of Chassidic Stories [http://www.nishmas.org.il/htmldocs/stories.htm]. There are several stories appropriate for this time of year including one whose title seems to have been updated. In Teshuva, Don't Leave the World Without It, we hear of a simple old Jew who doesn't seem able to die. We find out he has received an unusual gift: he has been permitted to live until he does repentance.

For more stories on a Rosh Hashanah theme, see the Web page by Eliahu J. Klein [http://www.storypower.com/hasidic/stories/rosh.html]. Also, see the link to The Rosh Hashanah Story, The Rooster's Message at Chabad's Jewish Children International [http://www.tzivos-hashem.org/ storytime/storytime.html].

If you want to take a break from reading the stories and want to have one read to you, you can listen to an assortment of chassidic tales read by Rebbitzen Sterna Citron [http://www.613.org/hasid.html]. You'll hear such titles as Why the Baal Shem Tov Laughed, The Miser of Zhitomer and Everything Happens for a Reason.

Finally, a tale about the power of stories from the Jewish Storytelling Coalition of New England [http://www.ultranet.com/~jewish/story.html].

Whenever Jews were threatened with disaster, the Baal Shem Tov would go to the forest, light a fire, and say a special prayer. A miracle would occur and the disaster would be averted. In later times when disaster threatened, his disciple the Maggid of Mezritch would go to the same place in the forest and say, "Master of the Universe, I do not know how to light the fire, but I can say the prayer." And again the disaster would be averted.

Still later, Moshe Leib of Sasov, would go to the forest and say, "Lord of the World, I do not know how to light the fire or say the prayer, but I know the place and that must suffice." And it always did. When Israel of Rizhyn needed intervention from heaven, he would say to God, "I no longer know the place, nor how to light the fire, nor to say the prayer, but I can tell the story and that must suffice." And it did.

I would like to wish all my readers and their families Shanah Tovah u'Metukah, a good and sweet New Year.

Agunah Get Day planned for Sept. 27

In a worldwide effort to help agunot (women denied a Jewish divorce) and their children, the U.S.-based group L'maan B'nos Yisroel International announces that Sept. 27 is Agunah Get Day.

On that day, which falls between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, "Jews all over the world are challenged to encourage recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah (repentance) and give their agunah wives a get (Jewish divorce decree) before Yom Kippur," a statement from the group says.

Recalcitrant husbands urged to do tshuvah

"Batei din (rabbinical courts) will be ready and prepared in various locations in the United States, Israel and Canada to facilitate the get process."

The organization says it will cover the cost of the sofer (scribe) who fills out a get.

The following organizations have lent their support to the project: Amit; Beth Din of America; Central Office for Agunot – General Administration of the Rabbinical Court of the State of Israel; Congregation Machzikei Hadas Rabbinical Court, Ottawa; Emunah of America; The Jewish Press; Kayama; National Council of Young Israel; Orthodox Caucus; Orthodox Union; Rabbinical Council of America; Rabbinical Council of California; Rabbinical Alliance of America (Igud Harabanim); Sephardic Rabbinical Council of America; Vaad Hair of Montreal; and Vaad Harabanim of Greater Monsey.

Other organizations are invited to join "this very important mitzvah. Please remember that evil triumphs when good people do nothing."

For more information, call L'maan B'nos Yisroel International at 718-338-0833.

To do good deeds, you have to get dirty

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

Seventeen years ago, I witnessed an event that had a wonderful effect on me. I was in my sophomore year in yeshiva, when we were told that the next morning we would be waking up at sunrise. A bus was going to be waiting to bring the students to the peak of the highest hill in the city.

Of course, when you have to get up before 5 a.m., there are lots of questions that need to be answered. We were told that this was going to be a rare opportunity to celebrate Birkat HaChamah – the Blessing of the Sun.

That day we did a lot of research and study into Birkat HaChamah. I learned that it occurs once every 24 years. I learned that the uniqueness of this celebration is the knowledge that the sun will be in the exact solar position it was in at the very moment of all creation. I also learned that the prayers must be said at sunrise.

The next morning, as I stood atop this hill, I uttered the ancient prayers, and one thought could not escape my young mind. I wondered where would I be at the next Birkat HaChamah? Who would I be? What would I be? Or even, would I be?

The awe-inspiring days of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are very similar to this. In fact, there is great talmudic discussion on the idea that Rosh Hashanah is also the anniversary of the beginning of all creation (Talmud Bavli Rosh Hashanah 10b).

But Rosh Hashanah is different because it celebrates the annual re-creation of our lives and time, and all too often they both seem less than perfect. In fact, in comparison to the rest of the world, humanity and life can seem to be dirty and a failure. Nevertheless, in spite of our failings, there is greatness here as well.

We are told of the great chassidic Rabbi Aaron of Karlin, who in his youth, loved fine clothes and beautiful things. He would never walk the streets because the mud would splatter on his pants. But one day he was leaning in his carriage when he suddenly realized that this was not the way it's done. So he stopped the horse and stepped out onto the filthy road. He walked the rest of the way by foot getting completely soiled. Tradition has it that this was the beginning of his greatness.

I cannot tell you how to think, but I deeply believe that if you are looking to follow someone, look deeply at the beginning of Rabbi Aaron of Karlin to remind ourselves that to do good, we have to get dirty. To achieve we have to get down, and live in the midst of life. There are more slums in our world than palaces. More rags than silk. More homeless than there are vacation homes. More illness than health, far more poverty than royalty.

In this month of Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we are called upon to wage war. To combat not merely ourselves and those habits which are destructive, but also to commit ourselves to making our world what God expects it to be.

Rabbi remembered for his service, compassion

By RABBI PHILIP S. SCHEIM

During the sad early days of the month of Av that commemorate historical and spiritual loss, the Jewish world lost Rabbi H. Leonard Poller. At the time of his passing, Leonard Poller was rabbi emeritus of the Larchmont Temple in Westchester County, N.Y., where he had served more than 20 years.

Guest Voices

But prior to Larchmont, Rabbi Poller was the spiritual leader of Temple Beth Sholom of Montreal. In a relatively short number of years in Canada, his influence in the community was profound and far-reaching.

I was 9 years old in 1962 when the young rabbi arrived at Beth Sholom from Long Island to assume the pulpit of the second small Reform congregation in a predominately Orthodox community. He was, to say the least, a captivating personality. An inspiring speaker, he challenged his congregation to live up to their moral and spiritual potential.

During those years of assassinations, Vietnam, the beginnings of the Quebec separatist movement and the resurgence of Jewish pride following the Six Day War, Rabbi Poller led us through the multitude of transformations with a clear message: that passion mattered; that we had to care; that we had to feel the pain of the disenfranchised; that by mustering the best of our Jewish strength, we could make a difference, even in the confused and frightening world of those years.

Rabbi Poller was one of the finest preachers in the rabbinate; yet it was not through sermons that his impact was greatest. He was true to our sages' injunction that action far outweighs words in importance. Orthodox rabbis spoke from the Reform pulpit of Beth Sholom, because Rabbi Poller understood, even before it became a widely recognized issue, the need for Jewish unity based upon mutual respect and tolerant diversity. Rabbi Poller led us marching in support of Israel and Soviet Jewry, even as he sensitized us, in unforgettable fashion, to abhor apathy.

Mutual respect, tolerant diversity

Rabbi Poller's decade in Montreal represented the golden age of Temple Beth Sholom. Not many years after his departure for Larchmont, Beth Sholom merged with the larger Temple Emanu-el due to demographic reality.

His tenure in Montreal also coincided with the height of that city's greatness, his departure, with the beginnings of its decline.

But, in a sense, Rabbi Poller never left Montreal. He remained in touch with his former congregants. When my father died 25 years after Rabbi Poller left Beth Sholom, we received a beautiful letter of condolence, as did other families at their times of bereavement, in their moments of celebration.

Nobody could expect a rabbi to continue such contact a quarter of a century later. He had another, much larger congregation, which he had served more than twice the time that he had been in Montreal. Why would he continue to connect with congregants from so distant a past?

The answer is simple: Rabbi Poller never served his congregants because it was his job to do so. Rather, he laughed and cried with them because they were important to him on a personal, human level. He really felt their pain. He really celebrated their joys.

I am a rabbi today because of Leonard Poller. I was the 9-year-old child whom he showered with attention and interest, who, through my teenage years, saw an incredible example of service to community and to human beings.

Even though, through the years, I have moved a long way from my Reform upbringing, it was my teacher, Rabbi H. Leonard Poller, who taught me by example the importance of viewing what I do, not as a job, not as a profession, but as an opportunity to touch people's lives. His rabbinate is the model that stands before me as I face the challenges of congregational life.

Rabbi Scheim is spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in Toronto, and currently serves as president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Community Matters

THEY'RE PHONING FOR FIFTY

UJA Federation is in the midst of its most intensive week of fundraising during the current Campaign for Fifty. The community's Super Week began with Super Sunday, September 13.

More than 800 volunteers – 600 on Super Sunday alone – are contacting thousands of community members to seek support for the campaign, which was officially launched on August 31. The telethons are the first in a series that will take place until December.

The Campaign for Fifty intends to raise at least $50 million annually by 2001, an increase of $13.5 million over last year. The additional funds will be used by UJA Federation and its beneficiary agencies to strengthen Jewish identity, provide more assistance to the vulnerable and to rescue Jews in distress all over the world.

"We can't thank our volunteers enough for delivering our message to the community," says Maura Cooperberg, who co-chaired the Super Sunday telethon blitz with immediate past UJA Federation Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar. Dozens of organizations, schools, synagogues and youth groups were represented at the telethons as well as key community leaders. "It was a real community effort," adds Cooperberg.

Goldhar and Cooperberg credit supervised children's activities on Super Sunday for the large family turnout. "We wanted to make it as easy and convenient as possible for parents to participate in a great day together with their kids," notes Judy Engel, Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign.

UJA FEDERATIONS RESPOND TO URGENT RUBLE CRISIS

These young girls, concerned about their future, are preparing to leave Russia for a new life in Israel.

An emergency mission of Jewish Agency emissaries will soon be leaving from Israel for Russia to encourage increased aliyah among an insecure Jewish population battered by economic chaos. Their presence will be accompanied by an expanded information campaign targeted to those who are contemplating emigration to Israel, but haven't yet reached a decision. Since 1989, the Jewish Agency, supported by the worldwide UJA Federation system, has funded aliyah for nearly 800,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union (FSU).

As the value of the Russian ruble plummets, so has economic security, which has always been tenuous. Many Russian Jews, who would like to leave for Israel, are unable to because financial panic has made it impossible to gather enough assets for the move. Age and illness are forcing others to stay behind.

Over 200,000 elderly Jews in the FSU live in poverty, with Russia's economic chaos now threatening even their meager pensions. "It is impossible to articulate the squalor," said Howard Lichtman, chair of UJA Federation's Marketing Advisory Committee, who recently returned from a mission to Moscow.

With winter approaching, the next few months look even more grim. The Russian government has announced a cutoff of fuel to Kharkov, the main oil distribution centre for Ukraine.

In response to growing insecurity in the FSU, many parents are sending their children on aliyah alone. The Jewish Agency will be encouraging these teenagers in Israel to provide even more encouragement for their parents to join them.

WELCOMING ED SEGALOWITZ

During his 20 year career in social planning, Ed Segalowitz has acquired an excellent understanding of Toronto's Jewish community. Now, as the new Vice-President for Community Planning and Development at UJA Federation, he's going to put his expertise to work in planning for the future.

Segalowitz replaces Morris Zbar, who recently left UJA Federation to become Ontario's Assistant Deputy Minister of Correctional Services. Segalowitz, who earned a Masters degree from McMaster University in 1992, worked for a number of social welfare organizations both inside and outside the Jewish community before arriving at Jewish Vocational Services, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, where he served as Executive Director. While at JVS, Segalowitz helped increase revenues by 100% for the agency, which runs vocational training, counselling and employment placement programs. He also helped forge partnerships between JVS and other communal organizations.

Before JVS, Segalowitz served as Executive Director of both the Ontario Association of Homes for the Aged (1980-82) and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living (1988-92). He also spent four years as an assistant administrator at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

This extensive experience makes Segalowitz a "natural choice" for the new position, says Sandra Brown, past president of UJA Federation and Chair of its Personnel Committee. "His tremendous people skills, combined with a strong grasp of important issues, make him a great asset," adds Brown.

Segalowitz's duties include managing UJA Federation's budget allocation process and working with lay leaders and other communal organizations to respond to growing needs within the Jewish community.

"This community has enormous expertise and our agencies provide invaluable programs and services," remarks Segalowitz. "I look forward to meeting the people behind the scenes and working together with them on the challenges we face."

Community Matters

VOICES FROM THE HEART

The following is an edited excerpt from Voices from the Heart: A Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel, edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, published by McClelland & Stewart Inc. The book, a collection of personal reflections by Canadians about their experiences in Israel, was produced as part of Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations. This unique , specially priced 395 page volume is available by calling UJA Federation at (416) 631-5685.

This excerpt, written by the late John Bassett, is the first in a series to be featured in Community Matters over the next several weeks.

I first went to Israel in 1958, the tenth anniversary of the State, as a guest of the Israeli government. The Israeli Ambassador to Canada, David Laurie, was a pal of mine. I paid my own way to get there – but once there, I was in their hands. Israel was just a little place; Jerusalem was split and you couldn't go to East Jerusalem. Israel reminded me so much of what it had been like in England during the War.

Because I was the publisher of the Toronto Telegram at the time, I met all the leaders.... But my favourite of them all was Golda Meir, who was then Foreign Minister. I don't know why, but we just hit it off particularly well together. The Foreign Ministry of the Israeli government had a very nice house in Jerusalem, built around an open courtyard, and my wife and I dined privately with Golda there. I was horrified to learn that Canada did not have an ambassador in Israel, only a charge d'affaires. We had an ambassador to Greece and Israel at the time, a fellow named Darcy McGee, but he remained mostly in Greece.

John Bassett with Golda Meir.

I remember saying in a boastful manner to Golda, "I'll get you an ambassador." She said "How will you get me an ambassador?" I said "never mind, trust me."

You see, in 1958 John Diefenbaker had just been elected Prime Minister. The Telegram was the strongest supporter he had amongst the media, and he and I were very close. When I got back to Canada, I informed him of the fact that Israel had no ambassador of its own. He hadn't been aware of this and he said "Yes, we absolutely should have an ambassador to Israel." He appointed Margaret Meagher immediately.

At that time, the Telegram, like other papers across the country, published a magazine supplement every weekend. I got in touch with Golda, and when Margaret Meagher presented her credentials, we had a wonderful front page....

In 1971, I was the honouree of the Negev Dinner in Toronto, the first non-Jew to be so recognized. With the money raised, we built the John Bassett Sports Centre, serving three kibbutzim about twenty miles north of Eilat, in Yotvata. About forty of us went from Toronto for the opening. I cut the ribbon, and it was very emotional.

A little boy, not more than eight years old, came running out of the crowd, jumped up into my arms, and said, "You're a wonderful man." I said, "How do you know I'm a wonderful man? You've never met me." "Ah," he said, "You've brought us water – swimming pools." Of course I started to cry as the little boy hugged me.

I wanted to get a television licence for Israel. I saw Ben-Gurion and asked him, but the Israeli government wouldn't give it to me, though I tried hard to persuade them. Instead, I went into partnership with Margot Klausner, an Israeli who owned a motion picture company in Israel, to start up the government-owned Israeli television station. Of course, they never would have gotten to air without us. They wouldn't have had any programs....

The Israeli people were dejected after the Yom Kippur War. I made a speech in Tel Aviv along with the President of Israel, Chaim Herzog, and I said, "You've no right to be downcast. You had an early setback. But you won the bloody War!" I said, among other things, I always believed, "Israel is not just for the Jews. Israel stands also for all of us who believe in freedom and democratic principles." It's the only country in the Middle East with those principles.

You know, Ben-Gurion said he didn't like the term "Zionist." He always said, "The only Zionists are those who live in Israel. Those who don't are 'friends of Israel.' We welcome them, we want them, we love them. But they're not Zionists." That was his view.

I never called myself a Zionist; I just call myself a friend of Israel. I'm as big a friend today at eighty-two as I was then.

- John Bassett passed away in April 1998.

Shabbaton Brings Jewish Deaf Closer to Community

It was a weekend full of firsts for members of the Jewish community who, more often than not, find themselves on the outside looking in. They were participants in the first Shabbaton for deaf Jews held in North America, sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf with support from UJA Federation.

Dr. Hartley Bressler, who helped organize the recent two day retreat held recently at a suburban Toronto hotel, said for many of the more than 100 participants, it was the first time they felt like they were part of a Jewish community. "It was like being at home among strangers who spoke the same language," explains Bressler, who is Chair of Dévelopment for TJAD, which arranges social events for deaf Jews living in Toronto. "People enjoyed being a part of something Jewish so much that they found it difficult to leave," he adds.

Rabbi Rabinowitz signs with Esther Fass.

Bressler estimates there are between 300-400 Jews with some degree of hearing loss living in Toronto - many with little connection to the Jewish community nor their own Jewish identities. "A great number of deaf Jews tend to feel isolated and disenfranchised from the community because of communication barriers."

Rabbi Dovid Eliezer Rabinowitz, the first deaf Orthodox Rabbi in the world and his deaf grandson Rabbi Chaim Tzvi Kakon, an alumnus of Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva, led the spiritual portion of the program using the A.S.L. sign language. Many participants put on tefilin for the first time and were called to the Torah.

Rabbi Kakon assists Elliot Richmond to put tefilin on for the first time in his life.

"The gathering together of so many deaf Jews for a meaningful Jewish experience achieved the goal that Judaism is meant for everyone, hearing and deaf alike," wrote Kakon, who, like his grandfather, has dedicated much of his life to furthering the education and socialization of deaf Jews. "Although the shabbaton is now a memory," adds Kakon, "many participants are enthusiastic about creating new programs, becoming involved in the Jewish community and developing better awareness about the needs of the deaf Jewish population."

The shabbaton also included workshops, entertainment and supervised children's programming. "It was absolutely magical," notes Bressler. "We didn't want it to end."

Full inquiry into IRB urged

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is calling for a full and independent probe of allegations of bias and anti-Semitism at the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB).

But the IRB says it has received no formal request for an independent inquiry.

Congress, as well as a Jewish former deputy chair of the IRB, say an investigation already under way is inadequate.

CJC president Moshe Ronen says that over the past two weeks, "numerous" sitting members of the IRB have called Congress offices in Toronto and Montreal, claiming that some of their colleagues openly express anti-Semitic, homophobic and racist views.

Ronen says the board members are also claiming the problem is ignored within the IRB.

Congress says there is a "cloud" over the IRB, whose 200 or so federally appointed members determine which refugee claimants are admitted to Canada.

CJC's calls for an independent inquiry came just days after IRB chair Nurjehan Mawani appointed Ottawa lawyer David Scott to probe an incident involving deputy chair John Frecker's having said "sieg heil" or similar words to two board members.

Frecker's remark, made about a year ago, led to a formal complaint by IRB member Jeanette Goldman, a child survivor of the Holocaust (CJN, Sept. 10).

Despite Frecker's apology, Goldman called his actions "indefensible."

Scott's task is to determine the content and nature of Frecker's remark, whether his apology was an appropriate remedy, and if not, to recommend what further actions should be taken. Scott has until this Friday (Sept. 18) to file his report.

But Congress says the probe does not go far enough.

"We're not dealing with an isolated incident but [with] a problem in the system," said Ronen. "We want to know what happened with all these complaints [of bias]. Were they shoved under a rug?"

Congress warns that if its demands are not met, it will consider "other options," including going to Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard.

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) voiced similar concerns, calling on the IRB to expand Scott's mandate to deal with "systemic" problems.

Michael Schelew, a former IRB deputy chair, also feels Scott's probe is too narrow, and he believes Mawani should step down pending the investigation's outcome.

Schelew, who says he experienced more anti-Jewish and anti-Israel bias during his year at the IRB than in his entire life, says Mawani is not acting in good faith.

"She still refers to [Frecker's remark] as an alleged incident," he says. And he wonders why the chair called an inquiry only after the media picked up the story.

As well, Schelew says Scott's probe does not encompass Mawani's own conduct. He also wonders why the board has done nothing about one member who is alleged to have made several anti-Semitic comments; and why it passed over two Jewish members up for promotion, overriding the recommendations of its own advisory committee.

Paul Hardy, a spokesperson for the IRB, said, "Nobody has made a request to the board that I know of. The only thing we know is what we've read in the newspapers."

He said CJC is reacting to "a lot of generalized and unsubstantiated allegations," but that the IRB is committed to examining all complaints.

Since 1995, the board has made 160,000 decisions, and received 33 complaints, Hardy pointed out. Of the complaints, 28 were finalized, and of those, just one was found to have any substance.

STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

Israel's remarkable 50 year journey has captured the hearts and imagination of Jews around the world. Against all odds, persecution has been transformed into triumph and dreams have become reality. No nation has achieved so much in so little time.

Now, Israel along with her partners in the Diaspora, must face the challenge of the next fifty years - the challenge of the 21st century.

New highways, rail links, ports and hydro-electric systems are the building blocks to Israel's continued success. Israel Bonds will continue to provide the working capital for these and many other infrastructure projects.

There can be no doubt that a strong Israel will, as it has since 1948, ensure the strength of the Jewish people over the next fifty years.

Israel Bonds are a means of securing our future as a family, as a people, as a nation.

Invest in the future of Israel.
Invest in the future of the Jewish people.

Day school fees up an average of two percent

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tuition is up this year at 12 of the 13 schools under the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE), but at an average increase of two percent, the rise in fees is described as ordinary.

The only community-based school to see no increase in tuition is Leo Baeck, where fees this year, as last, include $633 for a building fund.

The sharpest rise is at Ner Israel Yeshiva in Richmond Hill, at four percent. The lowest, at just .6 percent, is at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

In between, all increases over last year are three percent or less.

The nominally higher fees are in line with low inflation and a moderate rise in the cost of living, says Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the BJE.

"We've tried to keep things well under control. There's nothing unusual here," Shoub said.

Last year at this time, parents also faced an average two percent increase in tuition over the year before.

A year ago, the sharpest increase in fees over the year before was at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). This year, they've leveled off and "we don't anticipate any significant increases over the next few years," Shoub added.

That despite the fact that CHAT has the sharpest enrolment increase of any BJE school and is entering a building fund drive for its planned campus adjacent to the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

The BJE may soon expand its umbrella. The 3-year-old Toronto Heschel School, located in Beth David Synagogue, is now affiliated with the board, but has not yet applied for funding, Shoub noted.

Friends and relatives of the family were not commenting last week.

The Abadys came to Canada about 15 years ago from the Caribbean island of Curacao, home of the oldest continuous Jewish community in the Western hemisphere. George Abady was born there.

A friend told The CJN the family had been members of Holy Blossom Temple. The family will soon rejoin the temple, the friend added.

According to Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion, there can be no burial if there are no remains, and the family will be deprived of visiting a cemetery. However, he said a memorial service with all the same rules may be held.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has sent a letter to the Swiss embassy in Ottawa expressing condolences over the death of Daniel Dayer, Switzerland's ambassador to Canada.

Dayer, 58, was killed this month when he was hit by a train in the southern Swiss town of Sion.

Officials from CJC held several meetings with Dayer over the past 18 months on the subject of Canadian claims to dormant war-era Swiss bank accounts.

News of Dayer's death came just days after the Swissair crash and darkened an already sombre mood at the Swiss embassy.

Voices from the Heart captures Israel in 1948

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In June 1948, as the month-old State of Israel struggled for survival, armed Jewish units traded gunfire over a weapons shipment on board the cargo ship Altalena in Tel Aviv harbor.

As Jew fought Jew, a bystander onshore snapped a rare photo of the Altalena bellowing a column of black smoke. The picture is one of the many memorable photographs in Voices from the Heart, McClelland & Stewart ($75), a 395-page coffee table book about to be released to commemorate Israel's 50th anniversary.

Edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, two longtime community volunteers, the book was commissioned a year and a half ago by Julia Koschitzky, chair of Israel at Fifty, a community-wide committee that cooperated in numerous celebratory activities to mark Israel's anniversary, and Karen Morton, chair of Israel at Fifty Showcase.

Voices from the Heart is a collection of reminiscences and anecdotes told by Torontonians, and serves as a testament to the close personal ties between residents of Toronto and Israel, dating back to the pre-state era.

The vast majority of the book's photographs, all reproduced in black and white, come from the personal collections of the 300 contributors to the book. One of the first is a shot of Lord Arthur Balfour, author of the Balfour Declaration, addressing a teeming crowd marking the opening of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1925. Another memorable image is a picture of a small sports car being used as an ambulance after an Arab bombing attack in 1948.

Equally compelling are the stories accompanying the photographs, particularly those told by participants in Israel's War of Independence. Members of Mahal, Diaspora volunteers who fought for Israel, members of the Haganah and Holocaust survivors on board the famed transport ship, Exodus, have remarkable life and death stories to tell. Several Toronto Jews were on board the Exodus, which was intercepted by British military forces en route to Palestine. The survivors recount their battle, using potatoes, chains and tin cans versus British soldiers boarding the ship.

One of the more fascinating stories from the 1970s is told by Allan Gross and Fred Langer, who as young doctors volunteered to work in trauma hospitals, including an Israel MASH unit, during the bloody Yom Kippur War.

While most of the contributors are Jewish, several of Israel's Christian friends also tell their stories. Jane Mowat Martin tells how her late father, Herb, became a dedicated Zionist and founded the Canada-Israel Association, which helped promote goodwill between Canada and Israel. The late John Bassett described his first visit to Israel as publisher of the Toronto Telegram and his lifelong commitment to the Jewish state.

Section on young people

Turning to a more modern era, there's a section on young people connecting to Israel through common interests like the Maccabiah Games and the March of the Living.

Although the book contains stories told by many high profile individuals involved with community organizations, the bulk of the material is "not a who's who, but a broad, representative group," Goldstein said.

The research that went into creating the book revealed some amazing coincidences, she continued.

Shula Jacobi submitted a story describing how as a young child living in a temporary camp in Israel, she refused to go to a bomb shelter without her beloved red coat. For her it was associated with warmth and security.

Meanwhile, another story submitted by Kurt Weinberg described a clothing drive in the early 1950s to provide apparel for Israeli refugees. It turned out the red coat had been shipped to Israel from Toronto thanks to Weinberg's efforts, Goldstein said.

The UJA Federation plans to create a permanent, movable exhibit based on the photos, with accompanying audio, and employ it as an educational tool, Shulman said.

Voices from the Heart can be purchased in bookstores or by calling the UJA Federation offices at 631-5685.

Givat Haviva internship gives student new perspective

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although she'd been to Israel half a dozen times, including two year-long stints (one in childhood and one as a university student), Sara Borodin had never spoken to an Arab there, aside from bargaining in the shuk. That changed this past year, when she served as an intern at Givat Haviva.

Borodin, 24, first heard about the Israeli institution, which sponsors programs fostering dialogue, tolerance and coexistence, in her final year at McGill University when a friend e-mailed her from the United States to let her know about the internship.

"I knew nothing about Givat Haviva, but it was right up my alley," said Borodin, a Middle Eastern and Religious Studies major who had taken part in a Jewish-Palestinian dialogue group in Montreal.

She returned to her home in Toronto in late August after a year interning jointly at Givat Haviva, where she spent three days a week, and the Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair, an hour and a half away in Tel Aviv. Currently she is investigating graduate programs, and is hoping to gain more experience working in the non-profit sector and/or the Jewish community.

At Givat Haviva, she worked in the fundraising department. Her duties included grant writing, report writing and liaison with offices in Toronto and elsewhere in the Diaspora.

Sara Borodin

Both the Zionist youth movement and Givat Haviva are affiliated with Israel's Kibbutz Artzi Federation.

Last year Givat Haviva suffered "substantial" government funding cuts, Borodin noted. A program for Jewish and Arab junior high school students, Children Teaching Children, had its funding cut in half.

"I sense – especially among the younger people – a little hopelessness," Borodin said.

When you work at a place like Givat Haviva, she added, the work they do doesn't seem so difficult.

"Everybody gets along. It really is a model of coexistence. It's so basic – human rights issues, respect and understanding for each other and a desire to want to learn about each other."

Givat Haviva is not the only group in Israel to do what they're doing, noted Borodin, but they are the oldest (having been established in 1949) and the largest.

The organization serves students and educators on both sides of the nearby Green Line. It also has dialogue groups bringing together religious and secular Jews.

Meeting students and visitors both from Israel and abroad, Borodin "couldn't learn enough. I was asking questions all the time."

She is concerned about the effect of current government policies. "I really feel that every day the peace process goes nowhere, they're pushing people to the other side."

Conversion Authority rabbi urges end to funding non-halachic Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Scarce Jewish resources should not be squandered on encouraging non-halachic Jews from the Former Soviet Union to emigrate to Israel or to participate in programs intended for Jews, asserts Rabbi Raphael Ostroff, director of the Conversion Authority of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

Speaking to The CJN on a recent visit to Toronto, Rabbi Ostroff cited the example of a program in Kiev, where 88 per cent of the participants were not Jewish according to Halachah.

The Law of Return, he explained, allows "the third generation to settle in Israel," anyone with a Jewish grandparent. The upshot is that fully 44 percent of immigrants from the Former Soviet Union are not halachically Jewish; that is, born of a Jewish mother.

"To any Third World country, Israel is the promised land. Many are using Israel and Jewish money to escape their economic woes. They are using Israel as an escape route from the eastern bloc, or as a jumping board to another country," he charged.

While he was in Toronto to visit his parents, he said that he would use the opportunity to discourage Jewish agencies and philanthropists here from continuing to fund such people.

The Conversion Authority was established three years ago by the chief rabbi responsible for conversion, Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron. Its mandate, said Rabbi Ostroff, is to administer the Chief Rabbinate's policies on conversion, including batei din (rabbinical courts) and study classes.

An institution established for the purpose are essential. "You need rabbis that will understand the mentality and special characteristics of a potential convert. The approach is more educational, more friendly," he said.

While there are some potential converts from North America and Europe, the majority come from Ethiopia and, especially, the Former Soviet Union. For that reason, Rabbi Ostroff said, more preparatory classes are being established in centres with large Russian populations, such as Ashdod, Ashkelon, Carmiel and Haifa.

The 32-year-old South African-born father of four is well qualified for his post. After studying at Mercaz Harav Har Etzion yeshiva, and receiving smichah from the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, he spent a year in Kharkov, Ukraine, on behalf of the Union of Orthodox Congregations, where he got to understand the unique problems of the Russians.

"For four generations, the Russian Jews have had to assimilate," he said, "so there are a large number of non-Jewish spouses and children."

This is the first time in 2,000 years that the rabbis are confronted with thousands of people who want to convert, and "psychologically and halachically no one was prepared," the rabbi said.

A large proportion of the potential Russian converts are young women, from teens to those in their 40s, he said,because they realize that Jewish status comes from the mother.

Being fully accepted as Jewish by the entire spectrum of the population is important to Russian Jews, he said. "They see conversion as part of integrating into Israeli society. They don't want to be recognized as converts."

For this reason, the two documents they receive after being examined by the beit din, going to the mikvah, and for men, having a brit milah, are very precious. They are given the conversion document issued by the Chief Rabbinate, and the corresponding document from the Ministry of Religion, which changes the nationality status on their identity card from Russian to Jewish.

For this reason also, Rabbi Ostroff believes, they would not go to Reform or Conservative bodies for conversion. "They want to be accepted by everyone – including Haredim, the dati (central Orthodox) and Sephardim."

The controversial Ne'eman Commission report will have little effect on the Conversion Authority, he feels. First, he said, everyone agreed that the beit din, the final arbiter of who is accepted for conversion, should be Orthodox. Also, he said, the chief rabbinate had already instituted some of the recommendations, including more rabbinical courts, more preparatory classes, and more presence around the country.

Those coming for conversion must accept the Jewish faith, as expressed in the Torah and the commandments. "The Jewish people symbolize a certain faith to the nations of the world. A convert must agree to continue that faith, and those morals," Rabbi Ostroff said.

Before the Jews accepted the Torah at Mount Sinai, the men had a brit milah, and they all immersed in the sea. Similarly, he said, those who convert now must do the same – mikvah, brit milah, and accepting the yoke of the mitzvot and the principle of one God.

After conversion, Rabbi Ostroff said, what they do, religiously speaking is "between them and HaShem. There is no KGB checking up on them."

According to the Kabbalah, the rabbi mused, the neshamah of everyone who converts was actually at Sinai along with Jewish souls. "We are just bringing them back to where they belong."

Circle of Care honors volunteers

TORONTO — Circle of Care (formerly Senior Care) kicked off its silver anniversary year by honoring thousands of volunteers at a Sept. 9 dinner at Adath Israel Synagogue.

Among the volunteers honored were Anita Ekstein, who received the one-time silver anniversary award, Thelma Herman, who received the Marie and Jack Freedman Memorial Award, and Bess Good, who received the Sam Rotman Humanitarian Ward.

In its 25-year history, Circle of Care has had 10,000 volunteers. It is Toronto's second largest provider of home care.

Executive director Michael Scheinert said the agency provides Toronto's only Kosher Meals on Wheels program. It also organizes social gatherings and support groups, as well as weekly in-person or telephone visits to housebound clients, accompaniment to appointments, and assistance with shopping for necessities.

Jewish personalities celebrate start of Jewish new year

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Happy New Year! We questioned three well-known personalities about their High Holy Days plans, their hopes for the coming year, and their thoughts on the approaching millennium.

Arlene Perly Rae, author of Everybody's Favourites, and wife of lawyer, author, and ex-politico, Bob Rae, says, "For me this holiday is about the power of forgiveness. It's not that you can just instantly confess and be forgiven. It's about that whole capacity of people to recommit themselves, regenerate and rededicate themselves to goals.

"I've been a member of Holy Blossom Temple all my life," Perly Rae states, "and we go there for Yom Kippur and Rosh Hashanah. My daughters are all teenagers; so they can all come to the adult services now. We have dinners with my sister and break the fast at one of my aunts' houses. We're the same as everybody else. It's very typical, traditional."

Perly Rae says that although Bob is not Jewish, he enjoys all the Jewish holidays and the family times. "I think he's always found the services interesting. He has a wonderful relationship with Rabbi [Dow] Marmur. They've discussed literature and world events together for years."

Perly Rae has concerns as well as hopes for the near future. "I'm nervous about the rise of terrorism again. I've always found fanatics and individual craziness to be the only scary thing, really, out there. I'm excited to see that the world is starting to 'take on' terrorists. But I'm not sure what's the best way of doing that."

Her New Year's wish would be to reduce terrorism. "And [to have] people become more committed to finding solutions to all sorts of struggles around the world."

Legendary comedian Frank Shuster is best known as half of the comedy team of Wayne and Shuster. Although Johnny Wayne passed away a few years ago, Shuster is still entertaining us with his joie de vivre. He plans to spend the holidays "with the family."

As for the millennium, he says, "It's a scary thing because we're not sure which way it's going. But I believe most of us have a certain amount of optimism and we're looking forward to a wonderful new century.

Frank Shuster

"I'm getting on in years, and all I can say is that people should be as lucky as I am. I started in 1941 with the CBC, and here it is almost 1999 and I'm still doing shows for them! In the last few years, I've done several successful retrospectives, and I have one that's, as they say in the can."

Plus he just got the green light for another show – Wayne and Shuster, The First Hundred Years!

"They're gonna hafta shoot me to get rid of me!" he says with a laugh. "I wish everyone all the best for the New Year, and to have as much luck as I've had."

Author, journalist and broadcaster Lynne Gordon says that what's most important to her, not just for the New Year but on an ongoing basis, is growth and change. "My ideas are that the three Rs are not reading, writing and arithmetic, but reassessment, reorganization and risk-taking."

For this year, she is focusing on getting her book, Working Without A Net, the story of her fascinating life and career, made into a feature film or a movie-of-the-week on television. She hopes that actresses such as Glenn Close or Susan Sarandon, people who are very much their own person, with strong political views and their own production companies, will ultimately play her in the film.

Gordon plans to spend Rosh Hashanah with her children, and declares: "I am a free-spirit. Although my background is Jewish, the father of my children was a Methodist. Although I am not religious, all my children decided that they love the philosophy of the Jewish religion. This was entirely their decision. I was never brought up in anything, except to know philosophically that I am Jewish.

"Once in awhile I go to the synagogue, because I do like the feeling of being in touch with my roots. When I went to Israel, I went to get to know the people, not the politics. It was wonderful to see that country and to know that I would be welcomed there."

Newest Jewish student publication hits the streets

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cutting edge. Hip. Young. Intelligent. Maybe a little bit rebellious. That's the attitude Dave Gordon hopes to project with Afterword, Canada's newest Jewish student publication.

The 48-page first issue of the new national newspaper was to be published this week. Gordon, 25-year-old former editor of the Toronto student paper Images, was inspired to create not only the new publication, but also a national Jewish Student Press Association, after attending this year's conference of the New York-based Jewish Student Press Service.

Eight of the 23 participants were Canadian, Gordon noted. He thought a Canadian Jewish student media network would be a "fantastic" idea. "Practically speaking, a writer in Toronto or Winnipeg or Montreal, simply has more in common with [his or her] Canadian counterparts than someone from Cleveland, New York or Baltimore."

Gordon has learned of over half a dozen Jewish student publications across the country and has recruited 130 national delegates to write, distribute papers and solicit advertising. He is planning a Jewish student journalists' conference to be held here next spring.

The new organization's mandate includes "networking information, offering troubleshooting assistance and sharing what I know and what our editors know so that no student publication or editor needs to begin at the starting block."

An English literature major who graduated from York University this year, Gordon as editor-in-chief is working with George Brown College student Shira Honig, 23, and David Fleischer, also 23, a recent graduate of the University of Toronto. Honig and Fleischer, who also worked on Images, are senior editor, and delegate manager and editor respectively.

"All of us are firm believers in 110 percent thinking big and having a back-up plan of a back-up plan of a back-up plan," said Gordon.

To that end, the paper boasts a 55-page constitution, a 10-page policy and procedural manual, and a 17-page budget.

Afterword will publish five times a year and will be distributed free to Canadian universities, synagogues, Jewish business and community centres. Initial circulation will be 5,000.

The paper will include issues of national interest, opinions, politics and arts, said Gordon. The first issue features interviews with Shift magazine editor Evan Solomon, filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici and Barenaked Ladies member Steven Page. Among Afterword's goals is fostering a nation-wide dialogue for Jewish students.

Other Canadian Jewish student publications are:

• After the Flood – a mouthpiece for the writings of students and other young adults. A free, 8.5 x 11 magazine, it made its debut last fall. The 32-page second issue – an odd mix of voices with some admittedly "controversial" elements – was published recently.

Editor Daniel Fogel, a 26-year-old Osgoode Hall law student, created the magazine as "a response to the alienation of many young Jews from Judaism and from each other." For more information, e-mail [flood55@hotmail.com].

• Images – Toronto's Jewish student newspaper, under the auspices of publisher Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto. Published three to four times a year.

• Dorot – Toronto-based Jewish student literary journal. Features fiction, non-fiction, poetry, art and photography. JCS is a co-sponsor.

• Dateline: Middle East – a 16-page independent, student-run magazine focusing on Israeli and Middle-Eastern politics and news. Staff includes an Israel-based editor as well as a local one. Occasionally features poetry or short fiction.

Published three to four times yearly out of Montreal's Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, an academic think-tank directed by Concordia University history professor Frederick Krantz. Distributed at selected campuses or by subscription.

• Bleu et Blanc – French-language student paper, published two or three times a year by Montreal's Centre Hillel.

• Grape Juice (formerly Lifeline) – University of Western Ontario's Jewish Students' Union newsletter. Yet to appear in its new incarnation. Planned changes include beefed-up content. Aiming for six times yearly publication.

• Hillel Hub – four times yearly Jewish student magazine from McGill. CJN student columnist Erica Horn is a co-editor.

• Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students' Federation (APJSF) Newsletter – Jewish student newsletter of Atlantic region; an events listing mailed to members six or seven times a year.

• CyberSpiel – Vancouver Hillel's weekly electronic newsletter highlighting campus and community events. Address is [Hillel@ unixg.ubc.ca].

• HaKesher – newspaper last published by Hillel Vancouver three years ago is being revived. Print and Internet editions should be out around the end of September. Covers Vancouver campuses; looking to expand province-wide.

Oberlander a member of killing unit: witness

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An 81-year-old from Abbotsford, B.C., testified that he saw 3,000 Jews executed in Ukraine by a Nazi killing squad.

John (Hans) Huebert told a one-day Federal Court hearing in Vancouver on Sept. 10 that he and Helmut Oberlander of Waterloo, Ont., were members of a Nazi unit that murdered thousands of Jews and other civilians in the Former Soviet Union between 1941 and 1943.

The Justice Department claims that Oberlander, 74, failed to disclose his wartime record when he immigrated to Canada in 1954. The government wants to strip him of his Canadian citizenship and deport him. Oberlander denies the allegation.

Huebert, called as a government witness, testified that he served as a driver for the unit, known variously as Sonderkommando 10A and Einsatzkommand 10A. He said Oberlander was an interpreter for the unit.

During his 3½-hour testimony, Huebert described a massacre of Jews outside Taganrog, Ukraine, in November or December 1941. "The Jews had to register with the Germans in Taganrog," he told the court. "Then they were marched out of town, between two rows of Germans." Huebert said he saw thousands of Jews leave the city in this way.

A German officer ordered Huebert to drive him to a ravine outside the city.

As he drove, Huebert said he could see the footprints of the Jews in the snow. When they arrived at the ravine, Huebert saw rows of Jews who had already been killed lying face down in the snow.

An officer called the Jews who had been walking to come forward, Huebert said. "They had to lie down, and then they were shot in the back of the neck by six or eight Germans with machine guns." The victims included men, women and children.

Huebert said a group of non-Jewish Russians observing the executions covered the bodies of the dead Jews with dirt and snow. He noted that he did not see Oberlander at the site of the massacre.

Huebert also testified that on two occasions he saw about 110 Jews loaded into enclosed "gas vans" by officers of Sonderkommando 10A. Although he did not witness their murder with his own eyes, Huebert said he was told the Jews were suffocated by the vehicles' exhaust fumes in seven minutes. Oberlander was not present while the Jews were being herded into the trucks, according to Huebert's testimony.

Responding to questions by prosecutor Rob Goldstein of the Department of Justice, Huebert told the court he was born an ethnic German in Ukraine in 1917.

He was drafted by the Red Army in 1939, and his unit was overrun by the Germans in 1941. After he had returned to the family farm, he was sought out by a German officer and offered a job as a driver, which he accepted.

Huebert testified that the members of Sonderkommando 10A were "different" from other soldiers. "They were tough guys who didn't say much."

Sonderkommando 10A was one of several mobile killing units that followed the Wehrmacht as it swept eastward through the Former Soviet Union, killing Jews, Communists and anyone else deemed to be a threat to the Nazis.

Huebert testified that he drove Nazi executioners and their victims "once or twice a week" to the ravines outside Taganrog.

Huebert said Sonderkommando 10A left Taganrog in the summer of 1942 and went, via Rostow and Crimea, to Belarus, where the unit remained until 1943. Its primary activity in Belarus was combating the Russian partisans in the area.

Huebert left Sonderkommando 10A in the winter of 1943-44 and returned once again to the family farm. He remained a civilian until the summer of 1944, when he joined the Waffen SS, a combat unit.

After the war ended, Huebert was placed in a British prisoner of war camp in Schleswig-Holstein. He was released after six months in the camp and went to work on a German farm. In 1947, Huebert immigrated to Paraguay, where he lived for almost nine years. He came to Canada in 1956.

Defence lawyer Eric Hafeman told the Province newspaper that Huebert's testimony exonerates Oberlander, adding, "He was an interpreter – he had nothing to do with anything."

Saskatoon marks double anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

SASKATOON — This prairie city's Jewish community celebrated a double anniversary last month.

The community held a homecoming weekend Aug. 28 to 30, to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Jewish Community Centre and the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel.

Eighty former Saskatonians from across Canada and beyond returned "home," joining about 140 members of the local Jewish community for the celebrations.

"When we started planning this event, we had more grandiose ideas," says Dr. Stephen Goluboff, chair of the 40-50 Committee.

"We were happy with the turnout though. There wasn't much room for many more people at the functions."

The weekend began with a "meet and mingle" at the Congregation Agudas Israel Synagogue (with a membership of about 200 families and individuals), which is part of the community centre complex. Following kabbalat Shabbat, Senator Sid Buckwold, a senior community leader, spoke of the history of Saskatoon Jewry.

On Saturday following the morning services, Jonathon Kaplan, now a resident of Jerusalem, gave an overview of all the issues facing Israel.

Kaplan is the son of David Kaplan, a longtime professor of music at the University of Saskatchewan and a member of a local klezmer band that entertained on Saturday evening at a gala reception at the Sheraton Cavalier Hotel.

David Kaplan and Monty Floyd also performed excerpts from Love and Latkes, which Kaplan co-wrote with Henry Wolf, a Jewish professor of drama at the university.

On Saturday evening, UIA Canada's Dov Harris also brought greetings from a number of different national Jewish organizations. The highlight of the evening was a performance by Yuval, the Israeli dance group touring Canada.

Sunday, the community staged its third annual Joe Rosenberg Memorial Golf Tournament.

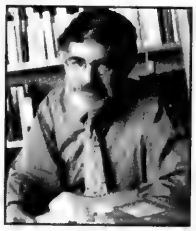
UNIVERSITÉ YORK UNIVERSITY

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

A MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR



This coming year York will celebrate the 40th anniversary of the University and the 30th of Jewish Studies at York. The emergence of Jewish Studies at our university and others is, in part, a product of the rebirth of Jewish life following the Holocaust. After suffering perhaps the greatest catastrophe of their history, the Jewish people sprang back to life inspired by the new State of Israel which has just celebrated its jubilee. In the postwar era, both Jews and non-Jews have been seeking to explore the meaning of the Jewish experience with its unique cycle of tragedy and triumph, and York University has proved to be a very congenial setting for such a quest.

York's Centre for Jewish Studies is also the result of another historic shift. In the postwar years, Canadians have turned away from the narrow national focus of the past and towards a broader vision of the nation which includes people of all backgrounds. The presence of Jewish Studies at York and elsewhere testifies to a conception of Canada as a multicultural country where people of different religions, races, and ethnic origins are all "at home."

Our Centre, then, is a tangible sign of a renewed Jewish community and of the new Canada. I am confident that our two new chairs in Jewish Studies will help lead the way, not only in understanding the past, but also in creating a better future for members of the Jewish community and for all Canadians.

My colleagues and I at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies want to thank all of our supporters for their assistance during the past year, and we look forward to your continued support in the future. We invite you to share in our activities, to enrol in courses, and to participate in our public events. Shana tova

Professor Michael Brown

FIRST SURVEY OF JEWISH STUDIES IN CANADA

The recent Guide to the Study of Jewish Civilization in Canadian Universities published by the Centre for Jewish Studies together with the International Center for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is the first comprehensive survey of the field ever undertaken. Copies can be obtained from the Centre.

CREATING THE JEWISH FUTURE

What does the future hold for world Jewry? Who's right, the doomsayers or the optimists? In a challenging new Centre for Jewish Studies publication, some of the world's leading younger and veteran scholars ask these vital questions and suggest some answers. The book grew out of a conference at the Centre sponsored by Bernard Ghert and attended by hundreds of community activists from across North America. The launch will be held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue on November 11.

J. RICHARD SHIFF CHAIR FOR THE STUDY OF CANADIAN JEWRY

The first endowed chair for the study of Canadian Jewry at any university in the world was established at York's Centre for Jewish Studies this past year. Professor Irving Abella, a distinguished, award-winning historian, has been appointed first chairholder. The chair has been given by J. Richard Shiff, his family, and friends.

KOSCHITZKY GIFT FOR A CHAIR IN JEWISH TEACHER EDUCATION

York's pathbreaking Jewish Teacher Education Programme is now receiving an additional gift from the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation to upgrade to a chair the professorship endowed by the Foundation three years ago. The position now occupied by Professor Alex Pomson is the first of its kind at a public university in North America.

HEBREW UNIVERSITY EXCHANGE

York's long standing exchange with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem has received a major boost with the new scholarships connected to the Ontario Government Matching Grant Programme. The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University are endowing new graduate and undergraduate scholarships for York students in all areas of study. York will be providing fellowships for Hebrew University students to come to York as part of their graduate programme.

NEW YIDDISH LIBRARY

The Yiddish-language books of Rabbi Nachman Shemen are now being placed on the shelves of York's Scott Library where they will be used by students and faculty. A gift of the Shemen family, the collection is notable for Holocaust memoirs and other works. It will give York one of the largest Yiddish collections of any university in Canada. A gift from the Howard and Carole Tanenbaum Foundation has made the cataloguing possible.

FACULTY HONOURS AND AWARDS

Several Centre for Jewish Studies faculty members were awarded major grants from the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada in 1997-98. These include Professors Martin Lockshin, Maynard Maidman, Howard Adelman, and Steve Mason.

Jewish Book Awards went to Professor Irving Abella for Growing up Jewish, which he co-authored and Professor Martin Lockshin for Rashbam's Commentary on Exodus.

CBC names successor to Clyde Gilmour

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jim Manishen, a classical music reviewer and occasional CBC radio host, is host of CBC's new Collector's Corner, successor to the long-running Gilmour's Albums.

Manishen, who began collecting classical records when he was a child, and asked guests at his bar mitzvah to buy him records, has a collection of 5,000 classical and other music discs and 8,000 CDs to draw on for his new show.

"Our format will be similar to Gilmour's Albums," says Manishen. "I play the classical pieces first and save the eclectic stuff for the end. I play a mixture of classical, light classical, broadway numbers, comedy records and music from around the world. I have scheduled a segment on klezmer, for example."

Like Gilmour, Manishen plays selections from his own collection, and talks about the artists and composers. "I will try to explain to listeners why each recording is special. Hopefully, people will find it enjoyable."

"He was inimitable," Manishen says of Gilmour, who died just over a year ago. "He had a non-highhanded way of describing music that I hope to be able to emulate."

Manishen differs from Gilmour in that he is a musician as well as a music lover and reviewer. He has been a member of the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra, and studied clarinet under Leon Russianoff at the Manhattan School of Music.

After graduating with a masters degree in music, he taught at the University of Brandon School of Music. He returned to Winnipeg in 1979. "I missed the Jewish community here," he says.

"I love working in radio. You can write about the experience of listening to a performance but it is not as effective as being able to play an excerpt on radio. It is a far superior way of getting the message out," he says.

Manishen first submitted his proposal for Collector's Corner when Gilmour's Albums went off the air. "Local CBC producer Andrea Ratuski helped me with the proposal," Manishen says. "To our surprise, a few months later, we were notified that it was on the short list."

Manishen has signed on initially for 42 shows, 10 of which will be rerun during vacation periods. The show will also be available on CBC's Web site.

Contact ProMontreal aids youth

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Over its five-year history, Contact ProMontreal has directly placed 1,154 young Jews into career-level jobs in Quebec, according to the latest statistics, and estimates are that another 800 or so were given assistance that helped them find employment here on their own.

This week, ProMontreal is celebrating its fifth anniversary with a series of events. Its career placement service for recent and soon-to-be university graduates is the cornerstone of the program, which was launched by FEDERATION CJA with the goal that the community do whatever was within its control to stem the outflow of young people from Quebec. It was believed that if young Jews could find suitable employment, many would prefer to stay here than leave.

"We've changed the lives of many young people," declared ProMontreal co-chair Lynne Kassie.

Despite the province's political and economic travails, Contact ProMontreal has each year recorded a steadily higher number of placements, said director Lois Liverman Selick.

In 1993, the program launched the careers of 134 young people. Last year, the total was 238 and, by the end of this August, the total had already reached 213, she said.

"For every 100 placements we make, we figure 80 others find jobs thanks to other services we provide, such as help with preparing a c.v., coaching for job interviews and referrals," she said, adding that it can't be assumed everyone who finds successful employments reports back to Contact ProMontreal.

The higher numbers this year and last are partially explained by the fact that Contact ProMontreal now also places second- and third-year students in summer and part-time work in their chosen careers. In its first year, the service was limited to recent university graduates, generally speaking within five years of getting their degrees. This latter group continues to account for the great majority of the placements.

The number of applicants for Contact ProMontreal's services has, over the same time, increased as well. In the first year, just over 300 graduates registered. In 1997, 748 persons sought Contact ProMontreal's services.

Selick said she is seeing some young people returning to Montreal from elsewhere in Canada. "Some have gone to school elsewhere, or want to come back because a boyfriend or girlfriend is here. Home has a big draw for Montrealers. There's something about this city and this community that they miss," she said.

"They come in saying, 'I know I'm bucking the trend,' but really they are not. The perception is that no one comes back, but they do."

Jewish entrepreneurs, mid- and large-size, remain the best employers of Contact ProMontreal's clients, but many large corporations also use the service. "This is a free service, unlike our competitors, the private placement agencies that charge a fee," Selick said. The program maintains a bank of over 2,000 companies that it can prospect. Cocktail receptions are held regularly at the Montefiore Club where employers and job-seekers can meet.

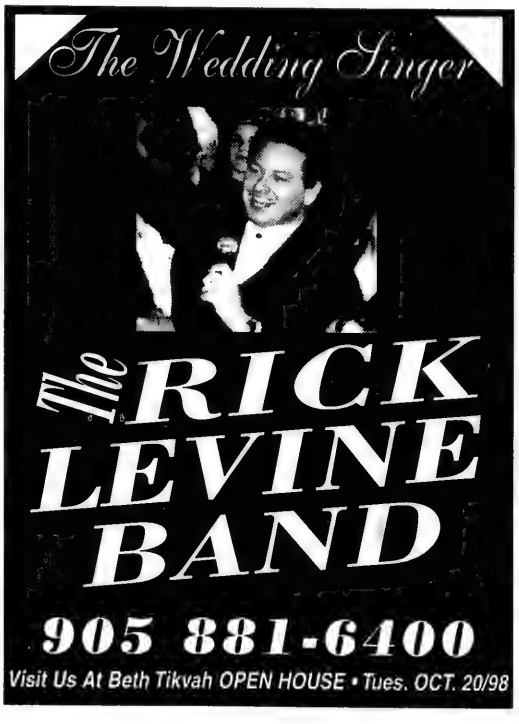
Contact ProMontreal has also received financial support from outside the Jewish community. This year it received a "substantial grant" from the McConnell Family Foundation, which boosted its $235,700 allocation from the federation.

"There is a great deal that is outside of our control," she admitted, "downsizing and politics, but we are good at providing opportunities that link people up [with potential employers]."

"It's been an incredible five years," said Laurence Paperman, ProMontreal's other co-chair. "We're constantly growing and excited about what we have already accomplished and our plans for the future."

Paperman adds that ProMontreal is more than an employment service. Its mission is to promote Montreal as a good place to live, by playing up its positive aspects. "It's about changing attitudes," he said. "Five years ago, you kept hearing that all the young people were gone, all the talk was negative.

"ProMontreal is about making young people aware of what they may not know exists here, and taking a second look at what they take for granted."



A happy, healthy New Year to our viewers.

Nurse helps deal with tragedy at crash

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Lorraine Tobia is tired. It's evident in her eyes, her voice, her demeanor. Yet she is ready to go again, if necessary, to give of herself so that others may have comfort.

The Halifax nurse spent a traumatic two days ministering to suffering families who lost loved ones in the crash of Swissair flight 111 off the coast of Nova Scotia. As a volunteer, she coordinated Red Cross personnel at the rocks of Peggy's Cove when families of the 229 victims arrived to view the crash scene.

A member of Shaar Shalom Synagogue and a single mother of two boys, ages eight and six, Tobia assisted in briefing sessions at Peggy's Cove, preparing families for what they might see, explaining the Red Cross role in providing professional nursing care and assistance, and helping distribute tangible keepsakes.

"We took people to the rocks, showed them the area where the plane went down, gave them hand-picked stones indigenous to the area, bottles of sea water, postcards, one-use cameras, and, for the children, teddy bears.

"No matter what the language, the children, and even some adults, reached out for the bears, pulled them in and hugged them. It was very powerful and had a profound impact on all of us."

The crash occurred late on Wednesday evening and by Friday, Tobia knew she would be on site Saturday and Sunday. She works in the oncology unit of the Queen Elizabeth II Health Science Centre, Victoria General site, in Halifax. She is also in the cardiac arrest unit, is licensed to give medications and is familiar with CPR.

"My father died when I was 10 because no one knew how to administer CPR," she recalled. "That's why I know it."

She said her original shift was seven hours Saturday and Sunday but she worked 14 hours Saturday and 18 hours Sunday. "Once we realized more and more people were coming, my presence was requested and I was willing to stay."

Knowing that several Jewish families who lost relatives would be arriving, and realizing she would be the only Jewish person in the support team on Shabbat, she took with her kippot and copies of the Shaar Shalom's Friday night service, with a transliteration of the Kaddish. (She is a member of the Shaar's chevrah kadishah.)

"I had the privilege of taking the family of Harvard professor and AIDS researcher, Dr. Jonathan Mann, and his wife to the rocks. I made sure the two pre-teen sons had kippot. The only thing I regret is not having a tallit with me. I was asked for one on that occasion."

She was upset Saturday at the presence of messianic Jews. "I was trying to do my Red Cross job for all the families as well as steer the Jewish families away from the messianic Jews. Fortunately, Rabbi [Pamela] Hoffman [of Shaar Shalom] stepped in and they quietly went away. Sunday, [Lubavitch] Rabbi Mendel Feldman was there and was very visible."

Late Sunday evening, just before support tents were dismantled, rescue staff, firefighters, army, police, Salvation Army and Red Cross personnel held a service on the rocks. Maj. Ron Stuckless of the Salvation Army read psalms and portions from the Bible. Tobia finished the service by reciting Kaddish and placing a small stone, on one of Peggy's Cove's large rocks.

"There was a full moon shining on us. It's something I'll never forget," said Tobia. "There was total silence as I said Kaddish. People were moved. My father's yahrzeit was two days earlier on the 13th of Elul, and I planned to be in shul Saturday. I didn't get to go, of course, and didn't say Kaddish until Sunday; so it was especially moving for me."

Many support staff will require debriefing and counselling, including Tobia. "I had a group debriefing session for a couple of hours with United States counsellors who worked the TWA crash and World Trade Centre bombing sites. I'm sure I'll have more counselling.

"In my business I have seen many gruesome things. I once saw a man who had been in a river for seven days and that was hellish. But it was nothing like what I saw here, drifting into the rocks."

Tobia said the experience of working with the families was nevertheless good for her.

Condo owners fail to suspend anti-sukkah ban

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Residents of the Le Sanctuaire condominium apartments who want the right to erect on their balconies or patios the temporary huts associated with Sukkot have failed in their bid to be exempted for this holiday while their case is in appeal.

Quebec Court of Appeal judge Jean-Louis Baudouin denied their motion to suspend the permanent injunction against the installation of sukkot and other structures issued in June by Quebec Superior Court Judge Andre Rochon, who ruled in favor of the Syndicat Northcrest, the co-owners' association.

That judgment is being appealed, but will not be heard for many months and a decision could take up to two years, said lawyer Steve Slimovitch, who is representing the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights as an intervenor in the case.

A suspension would have allowed the tenants to put up the huts during this Sukkot. The eight-day festival begins the evening of Oct. 4.

Baudouin cited testimony before Rochon from Syndicat Northcrest expert witness Barry Levy, a rabbi and dean of religious studies at McGill University, that the erection of a sukkah, or having one close to one's home, is not an obligation of Jewish law. He added that the residents' witness, Rabbi Moïse Ohana, principal of École Maïmonide, confirmed essentially what Rabbi Levy said.

Baudouin stated that there is a "major distinction" between "an obligation fixed by the Jewish religion and simple convenience concerning the exercise of it..."

He continued that, according to the evidence, the erection of a "personal" sukkah has "a purely optional character" and, consequently, maintaining the injunction would not cause the appellants "serious prejudice" or irreparable harm, "but simple inconvenience that can be easily compensated for." He noted that the Syndicat has made offers of accommodation.

Appellants Moïse Amselem, Gladys Bouhadana (who are married), Antal Klein and Gabriel Fonfeder, backed by respondents Miguel Bernfield and Edith Jaul, also Le Sanctuaire condo owners, argued that they were entitled to an exemption because "the very exercise of their religious convictions" will be prevented if they cannot install a sukkah. They say they will have "no other choice than to move to their children's or relatives' home for the Sukkot festival, which they do not want to do..."

The motion claims that Thomas Klein, who lives in the condo owned by Antal Klein, will, in fact, be moving out soon "in part as a reaction to the judgment rendered in this case" in Superior Court.

On the other hand, they maintained that "the only possible harm which might be experienced by the (Syndicat Northcrest) or non-Jewish owners or occupants of (Le Sanctuaire) if the judgment is suspended is of a temporary esthetic character..."

The co-owners' association has offered to put up a "common" sukkah on grounds adjacent to the building, but the appellants' argument is that this should not prevail over the "the right and interest to have one in one's privacy," especially considering that two of the aggrieved tenants are over 70 years of age. They add that what they were offered was actually a tent, which would not conform to Jewish law.

"It's unfortunate their request was denied," Slimovitch told The CJN. "It would not have caused anyone any harm to maintain the status quo."

The case has been in court since before Sukkot 1997, when the co-owners' association sought a temporary injunction to prevent the installation of sukkot, citing "numerous complaints" and condo bylaws prohibiting any type of construction or storage, except for garden furniture, on balconies, patios and porches, which are considered common areas of the co-ownership. Exceptions may be made for the placement of articles of decoration of these areas, if prior written consent is received from the administration.

The appellants have noted that other owners have had Christmas decorations, a jacuzzi, awnings and satellite dishes on their balconies and patios.

They also dismiss the objection that sukkot are a fire hazard because the huts are put on balconies at the back of the building, and it is the front balconies that are conceived as a fire escape as they allow one to go from one to another.

The association filed another motion for a permanent injunction against sukkah installations.

The appeal says the bylaws contravene articles 3 and 10 of the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which protects citizens from religious discrimination.

This protection is "not limited to actions required by specific commands within a religion but extends to the exercise of one's religion or conscience according to an honest and sincere belief...", it is argued.

The appellants also contend that no court should arbitrate "religious controversies, evaluate the correctness of a religious belief or determine the content of religious laws..."

Moncton park honors Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

MONCTON — The soon-to-be named Parc Israel Park, a greenbelt between Lewis and Steadman Streets, will be dedicated to the Jewish community to recognize Israel's 50th anniversary and to honor the contribution Moncton Jews have made to the city.

Mayor Brian Murphy made the announcement at a Yovel concert held at the Capitol Theatre in early September, where he and more than 250 guests enjoyed the music of the Israeli group.

On the same day, the mayor declared Israel Day, and had an Israeli flag, provided by community leader David Attis, flown on the city flagstaff.

Attis, president of Moncton's Tiferes Israel congregation, said the concert attracted a busload of people from Fredericton, 120 km away, and another dozen people from Saint John, 100 km to the south.

"We also had a large number of non-Jews," he said, indicating that the production was to "educate and inform the public that three minutes of a newscast is not what Israel is all about."

He laughed and added, "[This] was definitely not a fundraiser. We had to really sell the show. We had cooperation from local radio stations and newspapers. They ran contests and gave tickets away for us, and created great awareness."

At the concert, Murphy praised the contribution of Moncton's Jewish citizens. "They have contributed enormously to our business community, to academia, to the practice of medicine and the compassionate caring of our sick, to the legal profession and the judiciary, to the cultural community, and they are leaders in our political and spiritual lives.

"Though small in number, our Jewish citizens have positively contributed to our municipal fabric disproportionate to raw numbers."

שנה טובה:

אוטוטו ראש השנה בפתח. לאלה מיכם שלא השתלבו עדין בקהילה כל שהיא, תמיד פתוחה הדלת במרכז הקהילתי לישראלים של חב"ד ליובאוויטש. וכך מזמין אותך הרב לנדא:

"לקראת קול השופר בחר אחת מן האפשרויות הבאות: משקיף אדיש/ משועמם ביציע/ מתעניין אך מבולבל / או שותף לחויה המרגשת והשתתפות חדורת ידע והבנה למתרחש לאחר שהשתתפתי בהרצאות מתאימות לחגים!" טלפון 905-731-7000 שלוחה 25. ואם אתם מעוניינים, ישלח לכם הרב בפאקס גליון שבועי "לקראת שבת", ובו ניתוח פרשת השבוע ועניינים אחרים שבסדר היום. יש בעולם הזה כל כך הרבה שנאת חינם, שנעים למצוא, כמו בנווה מדבר, אהבת חינם.

"המדור לחיפוש קרובים"

ישראלים רבים אשר התנחלו בקנדה השיגו הישגים מרשימים בתחומים מאוד מגוונים, והביאו לקהילה סיבות להיות גאים. ואני קצת משויך כי לפני כמה ימים כשהייתי במונטריאול, ביקרתי בסטודיו של הצייר הישראלי יהודה שקי, ומה שראיתי הזכיר לי פעם נוספת שאנחנו באמת יוצאי חלציו של העם הנבחר. שקי גדל בחולון ואחרי שרות בצה"ל למד אמנות בארץ ובפריז והגיע למונטריאול. במשך השנים הציג הבחור בהרבה ערים מכובדות בכל רחבי כדור הארץ, ויצירות פרי מכחולו מעשירות מוזיאונים, אוספים פרטיים, ומפארות אולמות ציבוריים ובתי מלון. בחדשים האחרונים עובד שקי על ציורים ומוצגים שהשראה ליצירתם באה מתוכנית רדיו אשר שודרה בקול ישראל בשנים שאחרי השואה ונועדה לעזור למשפחות ניצולים שרק יצאו משערי הגרמיזם למצוא אחד את השני. זו תוכנית שכולנו זוכרים - "המדור לחיפוש קרובים". בסטודיו ראיתי ציורים, סקיצות ועבודות אחרות שהשאירו אותי פעור פה בגלל עוצמתם ועושרם הויזואלי. התערוכה אשר מתוכננת להיות מוצגת ב - 12 ערים בתבל, תהיה מתוקשרת ותכה הרבה הדים. חבל רק שבטורונטו - עיר בה שוכנת קהילה יהודית גדולה וחמה, ובניהם הרבה נגולי שואה, לא נמצא עדיין פטרון שיארח את התערוכה.

מכתב מלוּבה שולר

"לגידי קורן, אני קוראת את המאמרים שלך ופשוט אוהבת אותם. אני שייכת לקבוצת "Hidden children of the holocaust", של אנשים כמותי שהיו ילדים בודדים בשואה. בין 19-16 באוקטובר יתקיים מפגש גדול ב Washington DC, וקבוצה מטורונטו תצא באוטובוס מיוחד. המעוניינים להצטרף יתקשרו בבקשה אלי, לטלפון 416-783-5582. זו עומדת להיות חוויה נדירה."

SMOKE SIGNALS:

Serious reflections on repentance

At this time of the year we are all asked by God to do tshuva, repentance. All is forgiven for any wrongful acts we may have committed against God, such as not keeping the Sabbath or failing to keep kosher. However, we are also commanded to seek forgiveness from individual men and women for wrongful conduct against them. Therefore, allow me the indulgence to seek forgiveness in this column on behalf of the species known as the Divorce Lawyer.

1. Forgive him/her for advising you to seek reconciliation (which the law demands) before demonstrating how to demolish your spouse.
2. Forgive him/her for quoting a reasonable fee for services based on past experiences in similar files and thereafter being confronted with certain opposing lawyers who never heard of God or the concept of morality.
3. Forgive him/her for believing in God and having a concept of morality.
4. Forgive him/her for having to race to the washroom after waiting two hours to do so in the middle of heated negotiations.
5. Forgive him/her for not having the gift of prophecy, since the Court will not divulge the Judge's identity before you appear before him (so sayeth the Court Clerk).
6. Forgive him/her for telling you that black is, in fact, black, not white and that the Sun does rise in the East, even though you've been done a great injustice as a result.
7. Forgive him/her for not sending verbose and combative letters to opposing counsel every time you call and then charging you $100 for the privilege.
8. Forgive him/her for having to refer to opposing counsel, when before a Judge, as "my friend" when you feel like eating his liver.
9. Forgive him/her for having a spouse and children whom he sees, occasionally.
10. Finally, forgive him/her for failing to have a sense of humour.

Have a gut yontef, meaning: be good this year. On behalf of myself, my family and my colleagues, allow me to wish you a very Happy, Healthy, and Peaceful New Year.

Elder abuse said under-reported in Jewish community

By NADINE BONNER
The Wisconsin Jewish Chronicle

MILWAUKEE — Sam was a member of Rabbi Isaac Lerer's congregation, Temple Menorah, for many years. A widower, Sam (not his real name) came only to High Holy Day services.

He was "a sweet man, a humble man" said the rabbi, who would call Sam's home throughout the year to check in on him.

Then, a few years ago, when Rabbi Lerer called, Sam's son or daughter-in-law would say, "Sam is sleeping," or "Sam's out." The rabbi accepted their statements and called again a few weeks later. Somehow, Sam was never available.

But Rabbi Lerer was totally unprepared for the telephone call from Dorothy, a social worker who informed him that she suspected Sam was being abused.

Rabbi Lerer arranged to meet Dorothy at Sam's house, which he shared with his daughter-in-law and grandson. The son had by this time abandoned the family and the visitors were not allowed to enter.

Rabbi Lerer returned, accompanied now by the police, and broke into the house, which was filthy and filled with junk.

Sam was locked in a room on the first floor without any toilet facilities.

"How are you Sam?" asked the rabbi.

"Everything's okay, rabbi," Sam replied. But it wasn't.

"He was wet from head to toe," said the rabbi. Later, they discovered bruises on his body.

When confronted, the daughter-in-law denied any wrongdoing, though it turned out she was forcing Sam to sign over his pension and social security checks to her. She had already used up his savings.

"How could you let this happen to your grandfather?" Rabbi Lerer demanded of the grandson. He received a shrug in response.

Rabbi Lerer called an ambulance, alerted the Jewish Home and Care Centre, and had a reluctant Sam admitted to the home.

In an interview, Rabbi Lerer said it was the fastest admission to the home on record.

Rabbi Lerer became Sam's legal guardian and saw that his income went to keeping him comfortable at the home, where he lived until his death last year.

It is a shocking story, and Rabbi Lerer insists, an unusual one in the Jewish community. Or is it?

According to Judy Strauss, director of clinical and case management for Jewish Family Services here, abuse of the elderly occurs in the same proportion in the Jewish community as in the general community. Strauss has seen other "Sams" in her career, some in more affluent settings.

Elder abuse, she said, is even more under-reported than spousal abuse in both the general and Jewish communities.

In an interview, Strauss pointed out that abuse of the elderly takes many forms, and they are not necessarily violent. Controlling an elderly person's finances, isolating him or her from friends and relatives and controlling medication and care are all forms of abuse.

"Forms of abuse can be subtle," said Strauss. "It's not always the battering victims who end up in the emergency room."

And the abuse can come from a spouse, caretaker, child or grandchild. Moreover, the abuse can occur without malicious intent.

For example, Strauss explained, it can begin when one spouse sees the other deteriorating and is "not able to acknowledge it." As a result, he or she does not respond with appropriate behavior changes and may, for example, leave a spouse no longer able to care for himself alone for several hours.

Or the spouse may refuse to permit necessary medical interventions, such as surgery.

Although the partners in these cases do not intend to harm their spouses, the result is the same, according to Strauss.

Children are also threatened by deterioration of an elderly parent. Strauss said the Jewish community has a lot of aging parents with unmarried children, who have been living with them all their lives.

As their roles change and parents require care, the adjustment for the children to the role of caretaker is difficult.

"They aren't equipped to do that [care for anyone], because that's why they've been living with their parents all their lives."

The situation becomes even more complex, she said, if the child has a psychological problem such as schizophrenia, that has caused them to remain in the home.

Carol Seaver, chair of the Task Force on Older Battered Women for the Milwaukee Women's Centre, estimated that two-thirds of the women she sees are abused by their spouse or partner and another third by their adult children.

Bill Lishman of Fly Away Home fame, poses in the cockpit of the Crane Plane that he used to guide Canadian geese to their winter home in the south.

'Father Goose' opens up home

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Fashion designer, Paula Lishman, and her husband, William (Bill) Lishman of Fly Away Home fame, will open their home in Port Perry for A Day In The Country, a fundraising event for The Koffler Centre of the Arts.

On Sept. 27 at 10 a.m., a bus will leave the Bathurst Jewish Centre to visit the Lishmans' home, enjoy a kosher gourmet lunch, and visit the home of Dr. Ralph and Mrs. Patricia Price to see their Folk Art collection.

The Lishmans' 2700-square-foot, 21st-century earth-integrated domed home has been featured for its innovative design, in Equinox and Harrowsmith magazines and on numerous television programs.

Bill Lishman is an artist, sculptor, filmmaker, author, art director, inventor, pilot, naturalist and entrepreneur. His metal sculptures can be seen at the City Centre in Campbelton, N.B.; in the IMAX films, The Last Buffalo and Titanica; and at Canada's Wonderland.

In 1988, working with naturalist William Carrick, Bill raised a flock of Canada geese, imprinted them to an ultra-light aircraft he designed and built, and flew with the birds around southern Ontario.

Teaming up with a photographer, a pilot and others, he conducted imprinting and migration experiments by acting as surrogate parent and leading separate flocks of Canada geese on their journey south.

An award winning documentary, a book on his experiment with the geese, which is now in many public schools, and his best selling autobiography, Father Goose, led to the filming of Columbia Pictures' major hit featurt, Fly Away Home.

Lishman has also helped develop a highly successful, internationally renowned fashion company headed by his wife Paula, the president of Paula Lishman International. She was chosen Woman Entrepreneur of the Year in the category of International Competitiveness.

She created and patented a process for knitting and weaving narrow strips of fur and cotton fibre yarn together to create unique high fashion garments. The result is a luxurious lightweight fashionable garment that combines all the beauty and warmth of fur and the comfort and flexibility of a knit. Her garments are exported to Japan, Europe and New York. The Koffler Centre's tour will include a visit to the her studio.

Victor Topper, who is leading the tour with Judy Singer Gotfryd, says he and his family are delighted to visit the Lishman home "because when we were there last year with five of our grandchildren, it was one of the most exciting experiences we ever had."

For information or reservations for A Day in the Country call the Koffler Centre of Arts, Diane Uslaner, 416-636-1880, ext. 352.

Hill Street Blue's Belker appearing at Stage West Theatre

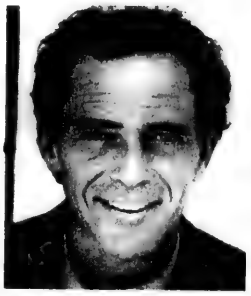
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

MISSISSAUGA — Actor Bruce Weitz has gone from playing a cop to a acting as a con man. Best known for his role as Mick Belker in Hill Street Blues, Weitz is appearing in the comedy, Bermuda Avenue Triangle, here until Nov. 15.

Born in Norwalk, Conn., Weitz moved with his family to Miami when he was nine. His foray into entertainment began as a result of a dare from other players on his high school football team. He tried out for the class play, the operetta, The Mikado, in which he attempted to sing.

Loving it, Weitz decided to study acting at Carnegie Tech, now called Carnegie-Mellon University, in Pittsburg, where he graduated with a master's degree in fine arts.

His show business break came relatively quickly. "They had what they used to call the TCG (Theatre Communications Group) auditions in Chicago. All the drama schools from around the country would send three or four of their best students. Repertory theatres from all over the States would send representatives there. The first job I got was from those auditions," he said.



Bruce Weitz

"My first professional job was at the Long Wharf Repertory Theatre in New Haven. During the 1966-67 season, we did Oh, What A Lovely War, The Three Sisters, The Tavern, The Night of the Iguana and Mother Courage."

Weitz continued to grace stages on and off Broadway and work at some of the best repertory theatres in America. In addition to appearing in 13 productions in the New York Shakespeare Festival, he was also in many plays, and acted alongside George C. Scott in a New York production of Death Of A Salesman.

"At first I was intimidated, but then I got over it," he said.

Weitz has had great success in television. Seven years on Hill Street Blues garnered him six Emmy award nominations; he won once. Since Hill Street Blues ended in 1988, Weitz has appeared in a number of series and telefilms. In 1989, he co-starred with Nancy Walker in the shortlived series, Mama's Boy. He also appeared as a regular on ABC's Anything But Love with Jamie Lee Curtis and Richard Lewis, and in Byrds Of Paradise with Timothy Busfield.

He has been seen in several made-for-TV movies and received Emmy nominations for his work in the ABC mini-series Baby M and the NBC series Midnight Caller.

Weitz has made a remarkable transition from the small screen to the silver screen. "I had a feature film out this summer called Deep Impact, and I have six other films opening over the course of the next year and a half. I did The Landlady with Talia Shire and One Helluva Guy with Michael York and Rob Lowe. Doing seven films last year was a lot for me. In the past I've mostly done television," he said.

"Film gives you more time to prepare. I can't imagine any actor liking television better."

The actor has used his celebrity for good causes. "I was on a committee for three years that Nancy Reagan headed for childhood drug abuse. The president and Mrs. Reagan invited me to the White House to speak. It was intimidating, very exciting and rewarding."

Weitz is married and has a 5-year-old son in Los Angeles. Acting for the first time in the GTA, Weitz joins actresses Betsy Palmer from Knotts Landing and Nonnie Griffin in Bermuda Avenue Triangle, written by Joe Bologna and Renee Taylor.

"The play is about two unhappy widows who bitterly oppose being moved by their daughters to a condominium in Las Vegas. Into their lives, comes a con man, Johnny Paolluci,who I play. He seduces one, then the other, and winds up living with both of them. Neither one knows the other is having an affair with him. I can't tell you the rest, because that would give it away," he said.

The play is currently running at Mississauga's Stage West all Suite Hotel and Theatre Restaurant. For tickets, call Stage West at 905-238-0042 or 1-800-263-0684.

BY BILL GLADSTONE

A display of photographic paraphernalia and memorabilia at the George Eastman House.

GEORGE EASTMAN HOUSE AND OTHER ROCHESTER SITES

When people in Rochester, N.Y. say they're going to "the city," they usually mean they're heading for Toronto – a metropolis that is about three and a half hours away by car. Citizens of this city along the southern shore of Lake Ontario often speak in glowing terms of the Canadian metropolis on the lake's northern shore.

Having just returned from Rochester and the Finger Lakes, I feel inclined to rave a little about Rochester, the picturesque Erie Canal system and the many sightseeing opportunities that the area provides.

Although more diversified than in previous decades, Rochester is still associated in the public mind with Kodak and George Eastman (1854-1932), the bachelor inventor who was to cameras what Henry Ford was to cars and Bill Gates is to computers. Eastman brought photography to the masses by inventing the dry-plate process, the box camera, the concept of film as a roll of exposures, and a process for color photography.

He chose the name Kodak because he liked the sound of the word; an early motto of the company was "You press the button, we do the rest." The company made him rich and he built a stately mansion between 1902 and 1905 that is now a museum open to public viewing.

A contemporary of Theodore Roosevelt, Eastman loved to hunt big game in Africa, and adorned his residence with impressive and peculiar trophies. There is an elephant's head in the conservatory, a desk in the library that was once covered with hippopotamus hide, and numerous waste-paper baskets, vases and other implements made of hoofs.

An aficionado of pipe organs, Eastman outfitted his 15-bedroom manse with more pipes than St. Patrick's Cathedral. When the pipes sounded, the house reverberated with music.

The dining room, modelled after a room in the White House, was where Eastman held his famous dinner parties, afterwards signing away millions of dollars to worthy charities. In the elegant gardens in 1928, Eastman and the American inventor Thomas Edison demonstrated the first color photographic process to members of the press.

And it was in Eastman's bedroom upstairs that at age 77 he scrawled a note, "To my friends, my work is done, why wait?", smoked a cigarette, then shot himself in the head.

Adjoining the fully restored George Eastman House is the thorough and engaging International Museum of Photography and Film, which displays more than 15,000 pieces of camera equipment and many great photographic masterworks. Frequent guided tours bring the Eastman legend to life.

Admission is $6.50 for adults. 900 East Ave., Rochester. 716-271-3361.

Strong Museum: Bring your preschool- and school-age children to Rochester's Strong Museum for a unique hands-on learning experience. The frenzied activity level indicates that the youngsters are having immense fun as they step onto a stageset from Sesame Street, pilot a helicopter or run a kid-sized supermarket.

The Strong Museum also features an authentic 1956 diner, an old-fashioned ice-cream shop, an antique carousel, a doll museum and much else. One Manhattan Square, 716-263-2700,

Other Rochester Sites: Completed in 1825, New York State's famed Erie Canal has long outlived its usefulness as a shipping corridor. In recent years, however, many old canal-related buildings have been restored. The Rochester suburb of Pittsford, for example, boasts numerous revitalized restaurants and shops along the canal, as well as Sir Oliver Loud's Inn, an 1812-era establishment that now serves as a comfortable bed-and-breakfast hotel.

Founded along a branch of the Genessee River some eight miles south of Lake Ontario, Rochester grew up as a mill town with a 96-foot-high waterfall at its heart. The Center at High Falls, an attractive urban development next to the falls, traces the city's history.

Rochester police arrested Susan B. Anthony, the early suffragette, for voting in 1872. Her historic home at 17 Madison St. is open to the public. 716-235-6124.

Aaron Skitrit

Passages: Aaron Skitrit, a renowned lute player and a co-founder of Toronto's Riverdale shul, died in Toronto Aug. 27 at the age of 54.

Born in Egypt, Skitrit lived for many years in Paris, where he attained a reputation as an originator of the style of music known in France and elsewhere as musique ancienne. One of the foremost interpreters of renaissance lute and oud music, his reputation was such that in Spain, England, France and other countries he was often referred to as "maestro."

After coming to Canada about 22 years ago, he spent some time teaching music at Queen's University. About ten years ago he developed a strong interest in Jewish mysticism and became an expert in the musical references in the Torah. He could expound exuberantly on the style of music played at the Temple in Jerusalem and other related topics.

Skitrit, who used the name Ben Schitrit when performing, appeared in the documentary Expulsion and Memory: Descendants of the Hidden Jews by Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici. Along with Jacobovici, he was a co-founder of the Riverdale shul in east-end Toronto.

"His passing is going to have a very profound effect on the community," said Jacobovici, "because everywhere he went he touched people."

Skitrit is survived by his wife Reena and their two sons, Leonard and Gabriel.

FOOD IDEAS FOR

ROSH HASHANAH

Kosher wine adds flavor to holiday dishes

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Say the words "kosher wine" and people immediately conjure up visions of a concord or blackberry wine so sweet that it could send anyone into diabetic shock. Thank goodness the super sweet fortified kosher wines of old, while still readily available, are no longer the standard by which kosher wines is measured nor are they what the sophisticated kosher consumer wants.

Today, kosher wines are available in dozens of varieties and flavors from all over the world and modern technology allows production methods to create first class wines that are comparable to non-kosher wines. Winemakers, using state-of-the-art winemaking techniques, are producing wines that are winning awards (and blind tastings) across the United States and Europe. Kosher wines are now being sold on the shelves next to premium labels.

RED WINE BEEF MARINADE

3 cups kosher dry red wine
3 tsp. salt
1 cup olive oil
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
2 tsp. kosher wine vinegar
2 tbsp. prepared horseradish
2 tsp. onion powder
3 tbsp. lime juice
1 tsp. garlic powder
2 tsp. cayenne pepper

In a glass bowl mix all of the ingredients really well and then pour over whole beef brisket. Let the beef marinate for several hours or overnight if possible. You can also use this marinade as a basting sauce.

TOMATO & BASIL RISOTTO

3 medium or 2 large tomatoes peeled and chopped
2 tbsp. butter
salt and pepper to taste
1/4 cup kosher Parmesan cheese
1 tbsp. fresh basil, chopped
5 cups vegetable broth
1/2 cup white wine
2 tbsp. butter
1 tbsp. oil
1/4 cup onion, finely minced
1 1/2 cups Aborio rice

Heat the 2 tbsp. butter in a skillet over moderate heat and add the tomatoes. Cook for 2 or 3 minutes, until the tomatoes become tender. Add the salt and pepper to taste.

Remove from heat and set aside. In a saucepan, simmer the broth for 5 minutes. Heat the remaining butter and oil in a heavy 4-quart casserole over a medium heat. Add the onions and saute for 1 or 2 minutes, until they begin to soften but not brown.

Add the rice to the onions; using a wooden spoon, stir for 1 minute, to coat. Add the wine and stir the rice until the wine is completely absorbed. Slowly add the simmering broth, 1/2 cup at a time, stirring frequently. Wait until each addition of broth is almost completely absorbed before adding the next 1/2 cup, reserving about 1/4 cup to add at the end. Stir frequently to prevent sticking.

When the liquid is absorbed add the tomatoes and basil and toss. If the rice needs more liquid add it at this point. Toss the rice and tomato mixture with the cheeses and serve with fresh basil as a garnish. Serves 6 to 8.

ANGEL HAIR PASTA WITH SALMON

8 oz smoked salmon thinly sliced
12 oz angel hair pasta
1 clove garlic minced
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 1/4 cup chopped tomatoes divided
1/2 cup kosher dry white wine
3 tbsp. capers drained
2 tbsp. fresh dill weed, minced
2 tsp. basil
2/3 cup Parmesan cheese, grated
1/4 cup fresh parsley, minced
1/3 cup red pepper, minced
3 green onions, sliced

Cut smoked salmon, with the grain, into 1/2-inch wide strips and set it aside. Cook the pasta according to the package directions then drain. While the pasta is cooking, saute the garlic in large skillet in hot oil until garlic is golden. Add 2 cups tomatoes, wine, capers, dill weed and basil; stir and cook until mixture is hot.

When you drain the pasta, place it in large serving bowl. Toss angel hair with tomato mixture. Add smoked salmon and cheese; toss gently. Garnish with remaining tomatoes, green onions, red peppers and parsley.

GRAPEFRUIT WINE SORBET

1 cup of freshly squeezed grapefruit juice
1 cup of a relatively sweet kosher white wine, such as a late harvest-gewurztraminer
1/2 cup of fine granulated sugar (or to taste)

In a saucepan combine all the ingredients and heat slightly to dissolve the sugar, (longer to evaporate alcohol if you desire). Cool the mixture down to room temperature and pour it into an ice cream maker. Follow the manufacture instructions. Serves 6

BRISKET BRAISED IN WINE WITH DRIED FRUIT AND POTATOES

2 tbsp. oil
3 onions, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. paprika
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. ground coriander
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/4 tsp. turmeric
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. cayenne
1/4 tsp. salt
1 pinch pepper
3 1/2 cups chicken stock
1 1/2 cups dry red wine
3 tbsp. honey
2 bay leaves
4 lb. brisket

Number of kosher wines available

[Cont'd. from page 49]

1 cup dried apricots
2/3 cup prunes, pitted
3 baking potatoes, peeled, cut into chunks
3 sweet potatoes, peeled, cut into chunks

In large saucepan, heat the oil and cook the onions and garlic, stirring often, for 15 minutes or until they are very soft. Meanwhile, in a bowl, combine the paprika, ginger, coriander, cumin, turmeric, cinnamon, cayenne, salt and pepper; stir half the mixture into onion mixture. Cook, stirring, for 30 seconds. Add stock, wine, honey and bay leaves; bring to boil. Remove from heat and let cool for 5 minutes.

Trim all but thin layer of fat from brisket. Rub remaining spice mixture over non-fat side. Place the brisket in a large roasting pan, fat side up. Scatter apricots and prunes around brisket. Pour the stock mixture over the brisket. Cover the pan with foil and bake in 325F oven for 3 hours basting every 30 minutes.

Place potatoes around meat. Cover and bake, basting every 30 minutes, for 1 to 1½ hours or until very tender. Let cool slightly. Cover and refrigerate for up to 24 hours. Remove solid fat from pan. Remove meat; slice thinly across grain. Return to pan; cover and reheat in 325F oven for 1 hour, basting 3 times. Arrange on platter. Remove bay leaves. Spoon juices and fruit over top; place potatoes alongside.

CARAMELIZED ONION CRANBERRY RELISH

6 tbsp. unsalted margarine
2 cloves garlic, minced
2½ lb. large yellow onions, halved and sliced thinly
¼ cup sugar, divided
2 cup fresh cranberries, picked, rinsed and chopped coarsely
1 cup red wine
¼ cup red wine vinegar
1 tsp. salt

Melt margarine and saute onions over medium-low heat until soft, about 25 minutes. Raise heat to medium high, add ½ cup sugar and continue to cook, stirring frequently until onions are caramelized (golden brown), about 15 minutes.

Add the remaining ingredients and bring to a boil. Lower heat and simmer, partially covered, about 25 minutes or until most of the liquid is absorbed and the relish has jam-like consistently. Serve warm or at room temperature. Can keep two to three weeks covered and refrigerated.

How's this burger bayou?

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

A burger can contain anything from chicken, beef or lamb to vegetables and tofu. According to the American Dictionary of Food and Drink, Americans eat three hamburgers per week per person. This is about 38 billion annually.

BASIC BURGERS

1¼ lb. ground beef
salt and pepper

Shape the ground beef into 4 patties, each ¼ inch thick. Place patties on grill over medium heat; cook 10 to 12 min. for medium or until desired doneness, turning once.

Variations on Basic Burgers

Greek: Before shaping into patties, mix the following into ground beef: ¼cup chopped fresh parsley, 1 tsp. dried mint leaves, 1 tsp. salt, ¼ tsp. ground black pepper. Grill as above.

Teriyaki: Before shaping into patties, mix the following into ground beef: ¼ cup chopped green onions, 2 tbsp. soy sauce, 1 tbsp. brown sugar, and ¼ tsp. ground red pepper (cayenne). Grill as above but during last 2 min. of grilling, brush burgers with a mixture of 2 tbsp. apple jelly, 2 tsp. minced, peeled ginger root, and 1 tsp.soy sauce to glaze both sides.

Tex-Mex: Before shaping into patties, mix the following into ground beef: 2 tbsp. finely chopped onion, 2 tbsp. salsa, 1 tsp. salt, 1 tsp. chili powder. Grill as above

STUFFED BURGERS

2 lb. ground beef
2 eggs
1 cup sweet pickle relish
¼ cup onion, coarsely chopped
3 tbsp. soy sauce
1 oz kosher bourbon (opt.)
2 garlic cloves minced
¼ cup green peppers, chopped (opt.)
½ cup kosher beef fry, cooked & crumbled (opt.)
salt & pepper to taste

In a bowl mix together the onion, relish, soy sauce, and any of the optional ingredients you wish to use. Be sure to get the eggs mixed in completely. Make 16 thin patties. Spoon a tbsp. of the onion mixture on the top of half of the patties, and top with remainder of the patties. Press firmly to join them on the sides. Wipe up the mixture that runs out of the patty and spread it over the top of the patty. Either grill until done (10 to 12 min., turning once) or broil. Serve on buns. Make 8 burgers

VEGGIE BURGERS

2 cans chickpeas drained and mashed (10½ oz each.)
1½ cup finely chopped pecans
1½ cup whole wheat bread crumbs
1¼ cup finely chopped spinach
¼cup grated carrot
¼cup chopped green pepper
¼ cup chopped red pepper
6 shallots, chopped
2 tbsp. chopped celery
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. butter or margarine

In a large bowl combine the chickpeas, pecans, breadcrumbs, spinach, carrot, green and red pepper, shallots, celery, parsley and mayonnaise. Mix well. Shape into 6 patties. Saute patties in butter or margarine, cooking until browned on both sides. Serve on buns or with pita

BAYOU TURKEY BURGERS

1 lb. ground turkey
2 scallions (3 in. of green left on) thinly sliced
1 red bell pepper, finely chopped
1 tsp. minced garlic
2 tbsp. chopped cilantro
¼ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. paprika
red pepper flakes, to taste
salt, to taste
black pepper, to taste
4 toasted hamburger buns
¼ cup mayonnaise-type dressing, for garnish (optional)
1 small ripe avocado, sliced, for garnish (optional)

Note: It is necessary to highly season turkey because the meat itself tastes rather mild. Yet, once ground turkey is cooked up, it's delicious. To do a taste test on the mixture, make a little patty the size of a silver dollar and pan-fry it in a nonstick skillet. This way you can adjust your seasonings to taste.

Place the ground turkey in a large bowl and mix well with the

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

A burger comes in many forms today

scallions, bell pepper, garlic, cilantro and spices. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Gently form into 4 patties. Grill the patties over hot coals, 3 in. from heat, for about 5-6 min. per side. If desired, spread the toasted buns with mayonnaise-type dressing and top the burgers with avocado slices. Serve immediately.

CHILI BURGERS

1 lb. ground beef
1 medium tomato, seeded and cut into 1/4 inches dice
1/2 cup pitted black olives, chopped
1 tsp. minced garlic
1/2 tsp. Dijon-style mustard
1 tbsp. chili powder
1/4 tsp. dried basil
1/4 tsp. dried oregano
zest of 1 lemon, grated
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill or parsley
salt to taste
ground black pepper, to taste
4 toasted hamburger buns
1/3 cup pareve sour cream, for garnish (optional)
3 green onions, thinly sliced (for garnish, optional)

If you over mix, the burgers will be too dense in texture. Fresh lemon zest and dill add a bright flavor to the robust chili spices. Garnishes are optional, but it's fun to serve burgers with all of your favorite chili toppings.

Place the beef in a bowl and mix well with the tomato, olives, garlic, mustard, chili powder, basil, oregano, lemon zest and dill. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Gently form the mixture into 4 patties. Grill the burgers for 10 min. (5 min. each side). Serve with pareve sour cream and green onions

BAKED BEER BURGERS

2 lb. ground beef
pinch of pepper
1 tsp. tabasco sauce
1 tsp. clove, minced
1/3 cup chili sauce
1/2 package dry onion soup mix
1/2 cup beer

Preheat oven to 400. In a bowl combine meat, pepper, tabasco sauce, garlic, chili sauce, dry onion soup mix, and 1/4 cup beer. Shape into 6 patties. Bake at 400 until brown, about 10 min. Baste with remaining 1/4 cup of the beer. Continue baking for an additional 10-15 min. until well done.

ORIENTAL BURGER

1 1/4 pound ground turkey
1/4 cup bread crumbs
1 egg
1 tbsp. watercress, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. ginger, minced
1 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. hoisin sauce
1 small onion sliced
cilantro sprigs
bean sprouts

In a bowl combine the turkey, breadcrumbs, egg, watercress, garlic, ginger and soy sauce together. Form into 4 patties. Grill over medium heat for 8 to 10 min. (4 to 5 min. on each side). Top with hoisin sauce, onion slices, cilantro and bean sprouts. Makes 4.

CURRY BURGERS

2 pounds ground turkey
1 large onion, minced
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1 egg white
1/2 tbsp. curry powder
red leaf lettuce sliced tomato
6 hamburger buns

Mix mayonnaise (you can use the reduced fat kind) with 1 1/2 tsp. of curry powder. Place in airtight container and refrigerate for 1-2 days. Mix turkey with remaining curry powder, onion, and egg white. Shape into patties and grill. Serve on buns with mayonnaise mixture lettuce and tomato.

New 'red book' a real treat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Several years ago, a small group of women were sitting around chatting. Just for fun, they decided to create a cookbook. And The Best of Bridge became a Canadian publishing phenomenon.

Since that first "red book," there have been five more volumes, each with a distinguishing color.

Now, a new volume has come out, The Best of the Best and More, a selection of the most popular recipes from the entire series.

It is laid out in the same comfortable, informal way as the earlier volumes – with red title and black print for the ingredients and instructions. The type looks like block printing. At the bottom of many recipes are humorous sayings, such as, "Isn't it a bit unnerving that doctors call what they do 'practice'?" or "The face of a child can say it all – especially the mouth part of the face."

The Best of Bridge series could by no means called gourmet; nevertheless, recipes are tasty, relatively uncomplicated to make, and family-friendly. Color photographs add to the appeal of the book.

SUPER BLUEBERRY LEMON MUFFINS

2 cups flour
1/2 cup sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
rind of 1 lemon
1 egg
1 cup milk
1/3 cup butter, melted
1 cup fresh or frozen blueberries

Topping
1/4 cup melted butter
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/3 cup sugar

Mix flour, sugar, baking powder, salt and lemon rind in large bowl. Beat egg in medium bowl; add milk and butter. Add egg mixture to dry ingredients. Stir just until mixed (batter will be lumpy). Stir in blueberries. Fill muffin pans 2/3 full; bake at 375 for 20 minutes.

For topping, combine melted butter and lemon juice. Measure sugar in separate dish. Dunk tops of slightly cooled muffins into lemon butter and then sugar. Makes 16 medium muffins.

'Humorous sayings'

CURRIED APPLE AND SWEET POTATO PILAF

1 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 cup chopped green onions
2 garlic cloves, minced
1 cup uncooked long-grain rice
2 cups water
1 1/2 cups peeled and diced sweet potato
2 cups peeled and cubed Granny Smith apples
1/2 cup frozen green peas
1/4 cup currants
1/2 tsp. curry powder
1/2 tsp. curry powder
1/2 tsp. cumin
1/4 tsp. salt
pepper to taste

Heat oil in a medium saucepan over medium-high heat. Add onions and garlic; saute 1 minute. Stir in rice and saute 1 minute. Add water and sweet potato, bring to a boil.

Cover, reduce heat, and simmer 15 minutes, or until liquid is almost absorbed. Stir in apple, peas, currants and seasonings. Cover and simmer 3 minutes, or until thoroughly heated. Serves 4 to 6.

RHUBARB STRAWBERRY CRUMBLE

Topping
1/4 cup pecan halves, toasted
1 1/2 cups flour
1/2 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1 1/2 tsp. grated orange zest
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 cup butter, softened

Filling
4 cups 1-in. pieces of rhubarb
2 cups sliced strawberries
3 tbsp. flour
1/2 cup sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Spread pecans on a baking sheet and place in oven for 5 to 7 minutes or until lightly toasted. Remove and let cool.

Coarsely chop nuts and set aside. Stir together flour, brown sugar, orange zest and nutmeg. Add the flour mixture to the softened butter and mix with a fork to form a crumbly mixture; add pecans and stir into mixture until evenly distributed.

Place cut fruit in a 8 x 11 casserole or shallow baking dish. Add flour and sugar and toss until well mixed. Sprinkle with topping and bake at 375 for 35-40 minutes until top is golden. Cool for 10 minutes and serve with vanilla ice cream. Serves 8.

Apple cake recipe returns

In the Sept. 10 issue, an incomplete recipe for apple cake with honey frosting was printed. Here is the complete recipe, with our apologies.

APPLE CAKE WITH HONEY FROSTING

Utilizing apples and honey, this easy-to-make cake is moist and delicious on its own, but the frosting turns it into a lavish holiday dessert. The cake and frosting can be made with non-dairy margarine for meatless meals.

2-1/4 lb. sweet apples, peeled, halved, cored and finely diced
1-1/4 cups sugar
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. (2-1/4 sticks) unsalted, non-dairy margarine or butter, softened
1/4 cup honey
3 large eggs
3 cups all-purpose flour
2-1/2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. finely grated orange rind
1 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped

Honey Frosting (optional):

2 large eggs, at room temperature
1/2 cup honey
1 cup unsalted, non-diary margarine or butter, slightly softened but still cool
1/2 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped, for garnish

Lightly grease a 13x9-inch cake pan with two-inch sides. Line base and sides of pan with a sheet of foil and grease foil. Thoroughly mix apples and 1/2 cup sugar. Let s tand while preparing batter. Beat margarine until smooth. Add remaining 3/4 cup sugar and beat until fluffy. Beat in honey, and then add eggs one by one, beating well after each addition. Sift flour with baking powder and stir into egg mixture. Stir in orange rind. Add apple mixture, which will be syrupy, and nuts.

Spread batter in prepared cake pan and smooth top. Bake in a preheated 350-degree oven for 45 minutes, or until cake tests done with toothpick or tester. Cool in pan on a rack about 20 minutes, or until just warm. Turn out onto a rack. Cool to room temperature.

To make frosting, beat eggs in a large bowl until smooth and fluffy. Bring honey to a boil in a small saucepan, then gradually pour honey onto eggs, whisking constantly. Whip at high speed of mixer until completely cool and thick, about five minutes.

Cream margarine in a large bowl until smooth and fluffy. Beat in honey mixture gradually until thoroughly mixed. Spread frosting over top and sides of cake. Sprinkle top with chopped walnuts. Refrigerate about two hours before serving. Serve cool or at room temperature.

Israel braces for Hamas terror retaliation

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel is bracing for terror attacks after its troops killed two leading members of Hamas.

Threats to retaliate for the Sept. 10 killings of brothers Imad and Adel Awadallah have been taken seriously by Israeli officials, who beefed up security at public sites across the country.

Israel also imposed an indefinite closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip – its first in more than a year.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet on Sunday that "there would be a harsh Israeli response" if Hamas carries out any attacks.

"Israel will not tolerate any attack against its citizens and will take swift action against the organizations of murderers," he said.

The killings came as U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross, who arrived in the region last week, continued to prod Israeli and Palestinian leaders to reach an agreement that would advance their deadlocked negotiations.

Palestinian officials said Israel's killing of the Awadallah brothers was aimed at scuttling the peace process.

Netanyahu spokesman David Bar-Ilan countered that Israel pursues suspected terrorists at all times, regardless of the possible repercussions.

The killings sparked several days of confrontations in the West Bank between Israeli troops and Palestinian demonstrators calling for revenge.

The worst clashes were reported in El Bireh, the Awadallahs' home town, where thousands of protesters, marching Saturday from nearby Ramallah, threw stones and bottles at Israeli soldiers, who responded with rubber bullets.

Clashes also took place over the weekend in Hebron, Nablus and Bethlehem. Dozens of Palestinians were reported injured.

A day after the Awadallahs were killed in a shootout with Israeli troops near Hebron, Hamas founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin called for retaliation.

"We will not forget the blood of our martyrs," Yassin said.

Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas official in the Gaza Strip, also said, "Israel will pay a high price for this crime," adding that Hamas would retaliate with suicide bombings similar to those carried out after its chief bomb-maker, Yehiya Ayash, was assassinated in January 1996.

Known as The Engineer because of his expertise with explosives, Ayash was killed in Gaza by a booby-trapped cellular phone in an operation that Hamas attributed to Israel. Israeli authorities denied any involvement.

In February and March 1996, Israel was left reeling by a series of suicide attacks in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ashkelon that claimed 59 innocent lives and wounded some 220 others.

Last week, some 300 Hamas supporters participated in a rally where leaflets were distributed promising similar retaliation.

A day earlier, Israeli soldiers stormed a one-room house near Hebron, killing the Awadallahs, who were senior members of Izz a-Din al-Kassam, Hamas' military wing.

Troops found a weapons cache, including an Uzi submachine gun, grenades, two pistols and three wigs. A large banner reading "Izz a-Din al-Kassam" covered one wall.

Army officials said the brothers apparently had planned to kidnap Israelis or carry out a drive-by shooting.

The deaths of the two, and the subsequent threats of reprisals, have prompted some debate in Israel about the value of the operation, given the cost it may have in terms of Israeli blood.

Israeli officials countered that the operation prevented a terror attack.

Meanwhile, there were no indications that Ross, who is making his first visit to the region since May, is succeeding at breaking the impasse in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

Netanyahu said the talks with Ross are "not centering on the Israeli side of the equation, but on the need of the Palestinians to honor their commitments" regarding security issues.

One of the main sticking points is Israel's demand to renegotiate an understanding on security cooperation worked out in December by Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. officials.

The understanding calls in part for a Palestinian crackdown on Hamas.

Netanyahu has rejected the initial understanding as insufficient.

Auschwitz crosses symptom of 'war inside the church'

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The crisis over the crosses at the site of Auschwitz has demonstrated that the fight for the memory of the former death camp is far from over.

But the struggle has also taken on deep political, religious and national overtones that have exposed several fault lines in modern Poland.

Extremists have seized control of the debate, hobbling efforts by both the Roman Catholic Church and the government to defuse the situation, and damaging Poland's image abroad.

Since the end of July, Roman Catholic fundamentalists have erected more than 200 crosses to commemorate the 152 Polish Catholics who were killed at Auschwitz and to "defend" a much larger cross that was used by Polish-born Pope John Paul II during a mass at Birkenau in 1979, and erected outside Auschwitz 10 years ago.

The cross affair has given a prominent public platform to virulent anti-Semites normally on the fringe of political life.

The two leaders of the campaign to put up the crosses, Kazimierz Switon and Mieczyslaw Janosz, "use the affair for self-promotion and to spread ethnic hatred," Stanislaw Krajewski, a board member of the Union of Jewish Communities in Poland, told JTA in a telephone interview from Warsaw.

News reports, he said, quoted Janosz as saying that Jews controlled Poland, the government, the media and the courts, and that the Mossad had infiltrated the country. He was even quoted as calling the Polish church hierarchy, who have condemned the crosses, "Jewish bishops."

Some 3.5 million Jews lived in Poland before World War II. More than three million were murdered in the Holocaust. Only about 10,000 to 15,000 Jews live in Poland today.

The standoff has also pitted Catholic radicals against the mainstream Catholic church in what Krajewski described as a "religious war."

This was exemplified by the fact that a German priest from the Society of St. Pius X – right-wing followers of French-born Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, who was excommunicated in 1988 for refusing to accept the reforms of the Second Vatican Council – blessed the crosses and attacked Polish bishops.

Krajewski says it might take direct intervention by the Pope himself to move a roughly 25-foot-high cross – the so-called papal cross – that is at the centre of mounting Catholic-Jewish tensions.

Jewish and Israeli organizations, as well as some Polish figures, have called for the removal of all crosses and religious symbols at Auschwitz, including the papal cross.

Poland's Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Polish government have condemned the erection of the smaller crosses and have called for their removal, but both have stated that they believe the papal cross should remain in place.

"Short of the pope's direct intervention, I can't foresee the cross being relocated," said Krajewski.

"His intervention would be perhaps a last resort and would be very, very welcome," said Krajewski, who is also the American Jewish Committee consultant in Warsaw.

"The war inside the church is escalating," Krajewski said. "Christians are fighting Christians. But the general feeling is that it is all the fault of the Jews. The atmosphere is very bad."

Krajewski, noted, however, that divisions on how to approach the cross issue have also emerged within Poland's Jewish community.

Members of the board of the Union of Jewish Community distanced themselves from a hard-line pronouncement by Chief Rabbi Menachem Joskowicz last month. Joskowicz, himself an Auschwitz survivor, declared that the presence of any cross prohibits Jews from praying at Auschwitz; one cross, he said, was as bad as 1,000 crosses.

"Joskowicz's statements were perceived as a war against Christianity," Krajewski said.

Krajewski faulted some Jews for failing to recognize that even though 90 percent of the 1.5 million people killed at Auschwitz were Jews, Polish Catholics, too, have a right to consider Auschwitz a symbol of Nazi persecution and to mourn the thousands of Poles who were murdered there.

Poles, he said, have the impression that Jews ignore the fact that Poles also were killed at Auschwitz.

"Poles do have real, justified rights," he said. "If Jewish leaders publicly expressed this, it could help improve the situation."

Israel worried by Primakov appointment

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Government sources expressed concern last week about Russian President Boris Yeltsin's appointment of Yevgeny Primakov as candidate for the Russian premiership, pointing to Primakov's ties to Iraq, Syria and Iran.

"His past activities and views about the Middle East gives us concern," said one source, adding, "we definitely hope we are wrong."

A source said that Primakov sees Russia "in an imperial context." He noted when Primakov was in Israel a year ago, "on three different occasions, he began his sentences by saying, 'we in the Soviet Union,' even though communism had collapsed several years earlier." While government sources concede that Primakov will focus his energies on the current economic crisis there, he may use weapons exports as a way to raise funds for Russia's depleted treasury.

Moreover, as prime minister, his influence on foreign policy will not only grow but may prove decisive. Sources in Jerusalem remembered that Primakov wrote in Pravda immediately after the Gulf War about how he braved U.S. bombs during the war while in Baghdad trying to broker a cease-fire that would save the Iraqi leader, whom he has known for 20 years. He wrote that he sought to prevent the air war from being turned into a ground war.

Primakov is considered Russia's leading Arabist. As foreign minister, he sought to shape a new equilibrium in Russia's foreign policy, making clear during visits to Israel that Jerusalem would be making a mistake if it ignored Russia due to Moscow's economic problems. Primakov believes the world ignores Russia at its peril. "Russia was and remains a great power. Her foreign policy should correspond to that status," he told his counterparts here.

In the broadest sense, he favors a selective foreign policy unlike the Cold War era when the Soviet Union would challenge the United States around the globe. He does not see himself as an adventurer in seeking to confront the U.S. militarily.

Yet it is unlikely that he will continue the forthright pro-Western policies of his predecessor Andrei Kozyrev, who was replaced by Yeltsin during an election year due to attacks by nationalists and Communists for not standing up for Russian interests.

In Jerusalem, officials noted warily that Primakov's appointment as foreign minister was praised by both groups, neither of which are favorably inclined toward Israel.

On the Middle East, Primakov's views have often put him at odds with Israel and the United States. He favors lifting UN sanctions against Iraq, to enable Saddam Hussein to export unlimited quantities of oil, to bring in hard currency that could then be used to pay Russian companies billions of dollars in Iraqi reconstruction contracts. He is known to have no quibble with Russian companies selling surface to surface missile equipment to Iran.

Close ties with Syria are also a Primakov trademark. He regards Damascus as both another market for Russian arms and a counterweight to the power of such U.S. allies in the Middle East as Turkey and Israel. But Damascus believes that the United States is the only country that could pry the Golan Heights from Israel.

Primakov has been accused at home of being chameleon-like, able to serve different leaders whether they be a Communist conservative like Leonid Brezhnev, a Communist reformer like Mikhail Gorbachev or a post-Communist nationalist like Boris Yeltsin. One commentator called him a "Russian Talleyrand, adept at switching careers and political patrons at exactly the right moment." Yet, when it comes to a Middle East policy, Primakov seems very consistent. He believes the road to influence in this region is having Russia seize opportunities and stick by its mostly Arab friends.

Terrorism up since Oslo: PMO

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In the five years since the signing of the first Oslo agreement, in September 1993, Palestinian terrorists killed more Israelis than in the 15 preceding years, the Prime Minister's Office stated in a communique issued in conjunction with the accord's fifth anniversary.

According to the communique, 279 men, women and children were killed in 92 murderous attacks by Palestinian terrorists since Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization signed the Oslo agreement on September 13, 1993. This does not include victims of attacks launched by Lebanon-based terrorist organizations or people killed in incidents along the borders.

279 killed in 92 murderous attacks

In the 15 years before Oslo, 254 people lost their lives in terrorist actions.

The communique also notes that in the six years of the intifadah – the Palestinian uprising in the territories that began at the end of 1987 – 172 people were killed, as compared, again, with the 279 murdered since September 1993.

The numbers referred to by the Prime Minister's Office include Israeli civilians, members of the security forces and foreigners who were murdered in Palestinian terrorist attacks that were perpetrated in Israel and the territories.

Not included are Palestinians who were killed by other Palestinians on suspicion that they collaborated with Israel.

The Prime Minister's Office also distributed printouts of material downloaded from the site of the Palestinian Authority (PA) on the Internet, which is said to prove that the PA is continuing to disseminate the Palestinian Covenant in its original form, including the clauses that call for Israel's annihilation.

The PA maintains that the document has been amended to eliminate the sections urging Israel's destruction.

However, the Prime Minister's Office states that the decision to amend the covenant by the Palestinian National Council (PNC) changed nothing. "Although the PNC asserted its readiness in principle to amend the document, the only practical step it took was to empower a legal panel to reformulate a new covenant, which will be submitted at some future date.

"Because the covenant is a legally binding document, a declaration of readiness to amend it is not tantamount to its amendment in practice," the communique states.

HAVE A FOOTHOLD IN ISRAEL!

Israeli-Palestinian peace: A five year chronology

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The following is a time line of key events since the Israeli-Palestinian peace process was launched five years ago on the White House lawn. The period was marked by at least 15 bombings of Israeli targets by Palestinian terrorists – as well as numerous drive-by shootings and stabbings of Israelis – several of which are included here:

• Sept. 13, 1993 – Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat exchange a historic handshake on the White House lawn as the two sides sign the Declaration of Principles, a timetable for launching Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

• May 4, 1994 – Israel and the PLO sign the Cairo Agreement for establishing self-rule in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho. Jericho comes under self-rule on May 13. Israel completes its withdrawal from Gaza on May 18.

• Sept. 28, 1995 – Rabin and Arafat sign the Interim Agreement, which sets the stage for an Israeli withdrawal from six West Bank towns.

• Nov. 4, 1995 – Yitzhak Rabin is assassinated by Yigal Amir, a 25-year-old law student, after a Tel Aviv peace rally. Shimon Peres steps in as prime minister.

Hamas attacks claim 59 lives

• Jan. 20, 1996 – Palestinians in the territories vote for the first time to elect an 88-member legislative body. Arafat is elected leader of the Palestinian Council with 90 percent of the vote.

• Feb. 25 – March 4, 1996 – Israel is left reeling by a series of Hamas suicide attacks in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ashkelon that claim 59 innocent lives and wound some 220 others.

• May 29, 1996 – Israelis narrowly elect Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister.

• June 22-23, 1996 – Egypt hosts the first Arab League summit in six years to develop a united front against the new Netanyahu government's approach to the peace process.

• Sept. 4, 1996 – Netanyahu and Arafat hold their first meeting. Both sides agree to discussions on redeployment from most of Hebron, the last West Bank town to be turned over to the Palestinians.

• Sept. 25, 1996 – Palestinian rioting erupts in response to the opening of a new entrance to an ancient tunnel alongside the Temple Mount in Jerusalem's Old City. In three days of violence, 15 Israelis and 61 Palestinians are killed. Hundreds are wounded.

• Oct. 1-2, 1996 – Netanyahu, Arafat and Jordan's King Hussein attend an emergency summit in Washington after the previous week's violence. The summit ends with an agreement for Israel and the Palestinians to launch intensive discussions aimed at reaching an agreement on Hebron.

• Jan. 14 - 15, 1997 – Netanyahu and Arafat reach the Hebron Agreement during a late-night summit

Fifth anniversary of 'handshake' between Rabin and Arafat held at the Erez Crossing separating Israel from the Gaza Strip.

• Jan. 19, 1997 – Arafat is greeted by thousands of cheering Palestinians when he returns to Hebron for the first time in 30 years.

• Feb. 9, 1997 – Netanyahu and Arafat meet at the Erez Crossing to discuss the next stages of the peace process.

• Feb. 11, 1997 – Israel releases 31 Palestinian female prisoners, among them some who had been convicted of killing Israelis. The move marks the second time, after the Hebron redeployment, that the Netanyahu government acts to fulfill clauses of the Interim Agreement.

• March 18, 1997 – Israeli bulldozers begin construction work for the new Jewish neighborhood of Har Homa in eastern Jerusalem. The Palestinian Authority soon suspends negotiations with Israel.

• March 21, 1997 – Three days after the start of construction at Har Homa, a Hamas suicide bomber detonates an explosion at the Cafe Apropo in central Tel Aviv, killing three Israelis and wounding 47 others.

• July 30, 1997 – Two suicide bombers strike in the Mahane Yehuda open-air market in Jerusalem, claiming 16 victims and wounding 170 others.

• Aug. 20-21 1997 – Arafat holds "National Unity Conference," during which he embraces political leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Israeli officials question Arafat's commitment to cracking down on terrorists.

• Sept. 4, 1997 – Three suicide bombers detonate near-simultaneous explosions at the Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall in downtown Jerusalem, killing five and wounding more than 190.

• Sept. 7, 1997 – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu tells a Cabinet meeting that Israel will not "follow the normal course of the Interim Agreement" because of the clear "violations on the part of the Palestinian Authority."

Peace process remains deadlocked

• Sept. 10, 1997– U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright makes her first visit to the Middle East since becoming America's top diplomat in January. After leaving Jerusalem three days later, Albright admits that she made little progress in her meetings with Israeli and Palestinian officials. She states that she will not return to the region just to "tread water."

• Oct. 1, 1997 – Israel frees Hamas spiritual leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin. Five days later, Yassin returns to a hero's welcome in Gaza.

• Oct. 7, 1997 – For the first time since the furor erupted over Har Homa, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators meet to discuss implementing portions of the Interim Agreement – including a safe-passage route, an airport and seaport in Gaza and the return of Palestinian prisoners. None of the issues have yet been resolved.

• Oct. 8, 1997 – Netanyahu and Arafat hold a pre-dawn meeting at the Erez Crossing. The two have not met since.

• Jan. 19, 1998 – Netanyahu begins a three-day visit to Washington. His meeting with President Clinton is overshadowed by a breaking scandal involving former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. Reports in the Arab press allege that the sex scandal was a Zionist plot aimed at deflecting Clinton's attention from the stalemated peace process.

• May 4-5, 1998 – Albright holds separate meetings in London with Netanyahu and Arafat in an effort to move the deadlocked peace process forward. The parties discuss a widely reported U.S. proposal, floated for months, under which Israel would redeploy from a further 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for specific Palestinian steps against terror. The talks are inconclusive.

• Aug. 27, 1998 – Bomb filled with nails explodes in a trash can in Tel Aviv. Twenty-one people are injured in the attack.

• Sept. 9, 1998 – U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross arrives in the region for another round of shuttle diplomacy aimed at breaking the stalemated peace process. Political observers believe his trip signals that the talks are in the final stretch. The more optimistic among them say that Israel and the Palestinians will sign an agreement on or near the fifth anniversary of the historic Rabin-Arafat handshake.

For Israel, 5758 was a year of division and disappointment

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The year now drawing to a close can hardly be described as having been a particularly good one for Israel, even by the most optimistic of observers.

Analysis

On the other hand, 5758 cannot be depicted as an especially bad year – even by the Netanyahu government's most virulent critics.

It was not a year of war, and even the perennial scourge of terrorism was less devastating than in previous years.

Just the same, this was the year in which Israel marked its jubilee. And despite what one might have expected on the 50th anniversary of Israel's birth, there is a sense of disappointment in the national mood.

Even though the government spent some $40 million (U.S.) on the jubilee celebrations, the anniversary events failed to recreate that spirit of dancing in the streets, of transcendent national purpose and unity, that accompanied the creation of the state five decades ago.

Perhaps the strongest indicator that Israeli society was not in a celebratory mood came on Independence Day, on what should have been the high point of the jubilee year. A lavish pageant mounted in late April at a Jerusalem stadium, with U.S. Vice President Al Gore present as the guest of honor, was beset by behind-the-scenes strife that seeped onto the stage, spoiled some of the performances and triggered weeks of nationwide confrontations between secular and Orthodox Israelis.

The confrontations centered on a scheduled performance by the Batsheva Dance Company in which the dancers planned to strip down to their underwear during a song based on the Passover Haggadah. Leaders of the haredi community objected, calling the performance immodest. A compromise was struck under which the dancers were to wear tights – but the troupe finally canceled its performance, saying it had been subjected to undue political pressure.

Perhaps laughable in other countries, the dispute seemed to dredge up all the unresolved tension and anger that still gnaw at the solidarity of Israeli society – and that stand in such stark contrast to the country's material achievements in its relatively short existence.

Indeed, religious-secular tensions seemed more bitter and prevalent in Israel at its 50th anniversary than at any previous period.

Things were said and written this past year – on both sides of the divide – that would have been unthinkable, or at any rate unprintable, only a few short years ago.

Certainly they would have been unutterable in the early period of the state, when, despite all the rancor and deep ideological differences that also existed then, there was an overarching awareness that Israel itself seemed to exist only by the grace of God.

One aspect of the worsening conflict is Israel's continued failure, indeed refusal, to accept the pluralistic stance that American Jews consider a natural expression of democracy and of Judaism.

An interdenominational commission headed by the minister of finance, Ya'acov Ne'eman, produced a blueprint for compromise – at least on the issue of non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel.

But even this compromise was effectively blocked and shelved during the year by what each side in the divide said was the other's obstinacy.

Families carry the scars of failed absorption for decades

Sociologists and political scientists at least partly attribute the intensification of the religious-secular conflict to the fact that all of the Orthodox parties to the dispute are partners in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition government, while much of the secularist forces side with the parties of the left and center, which are in the opposition.

Along with the resurgence of Orthodox-secular tensions, the jubilee year was marred by a sharp and unexpected wave of Sephardi-Ashkenazi resentments – that other acid that eats at Israel's social foundations and that many Israelis had hoped was disappearing.

The backdrop was a worsening economic situation, with more than 200,000 people on the unemployment rolls by year's end.

Hardest hit, as always, were the development towns and the down-and-out urban suburbs – the homes of Sephardi families, who carry the scars of failed absorption for decades and generations.

Comments made during the summer by a leading Labor Party figure, Ori Orr, brought the controversy back into the headlines.

Orr claimed that Moroccan Israelis were less "Israeli" than others and are less inclined to logical reasoning. This, he explained, was the cause of that community's refusal to embrace the Labor Party, despite party leader Ehud Barak's attempt last October to apologize on behalf of Labor's past generations for the wrongs that Sephardi immigrants may have suffered during their absorption into Israeli society during the early years of the state.

The turmoil caused by Orr's impolitic statements has yet to subside – and despite some observers' hopes, it is still years from healing.

Not surprisingly, evaluations of the past year differ depending on one's political ideology.

For political doves, 5758 was a year of inactivity, a wasted year in which the peace process proceeded nowhere, in which negotiations with the Palestinians were suspended most of the time, in which negotiations with other Arab partners were non-existent – and in which, as a result, Israel's relations with the United States and much of the world declined.

Now, the doves add, with the end of the five-year interim period prescribed by the Oslo accords just months away, peace with the Palestinians seems hopelessly off track and bereft of even a modicum of mutual trust and good will.

The doves warn of an explosion of frustration and violence in the Palestinian territories that could destroy the last vestiges of the accords.

Government critics also cite the slowdown in Israel's economy as evidence of Netanyahu's misguided domestic priorities and of the international community's negative reaction to the withering peace process.

The government's supporters, on the other hand, have a far more positive end-of-year assessment.

In their view, Netanyahu has succeeded in delivering on his electoral pledges: He remains committed to Oslo – but is determined to negotiate more slowly and more cautiously than the previous, Labor led government.

The reduction in terrorist activity, they say, is tangible evidence Netanyahu's tough line is paying off.

They hold similar views about the economy. The slowdown is hard on certain sectors, they admit, but it is under control.

The government's underlying policies are healthy and will lead to real growth, government supporters contend. Above all, they add, inflation has been curbed to just 4 percent annually – giving investors at home and abroad a sense of confidence and security.

And so, it seems, 5758 was either a bad year or a not-that-bad year for Israelis, depending on their individual political, religious and ethnic perspectives.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 7

• Some 300,000 workers ended their five-day strike after getting a 1.5 percent wage increase. The agreement did not affect schoolteachers, who have been on strike for more than a week. (The teachers' strike ended two days later.)

Sept. 8

• Israel announced it is planning a joint naval exercise with Turkey and will invite Egypt and Jordan to participate. (The following day, Israel announced it was also planning a joint air force exercise with Turkey.)

Sept. 9

• Intelligence officials reportedly believe that Iran is developing a spy satellite as part of its ballistic missile program.

• Jews in the West Bank and Gaza Strip number nearly 170,000, an increase of 3.3 percent during the first half of the year. The increase is the result of a combination of both natural increase and immigration.

Sept. 10

• The Palestinian Authority is furtively strengthening its presence in eastern Jerusalem according to a ministerial committee report.

• A Palestinian woman died after being shot by security forces when she walked into a clash with Palestinian demonstrators.

Sept. 11

• Some 50,000 Israelis gathered in the Tel Aviv square where Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. The gathering demanded that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu resign.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, Sept. 12 — The nine-week UN-brokered ceasefire has had little meaning in Jerusalem, where artillery and automatic fire are heard almost every day and where a large-scale duel yesterday between Arab and Jewish mortars and cannon resulted in a number of casualties.

For the Jerusalem inhabitants, the truce has been almost as costly in lives, disruption of everyday living and economic losses as a full-fledged war.

New party discussed

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The possible formation of a new centrist party that will run former Finance Minister and Likud stalwart MK Dan Meridor for prime minister has been discussed recently in meetings involving Meridor and two MKs from the Third Way, Alex Lubotzky and Yehuda Harel.

Also present at some of the meetings was Matan Vilna'i, the disgruntled would-be chief of staff, passed over for the position in favor of Shaul Mofaz. Vilna'i is considered almost certain to join the new list.

The former major-general, who has been in close contact with Lubotzky since leaving the army (the two head a recently formed social action body called the Yeruham Group), recently met with Harel about establishing a new party.

In an interview last week with Army Radio, Vilna'i said if he does enter politics he would prefer the centre. Talks have revolved around two main scenarios: either the formation of a list headed by Meridor, backed by Harel and Lubotzky, or the establishment of a broad centrist bloc, to be led by Meridor and incorporating the Third Way.

Harel and Lubotzky informed Third Way leader Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani about the talks only last week. Kahalani was, reportedly, not overjoyed, but said he would not object if Harel holds talks on the Third Way's behalf.

Most involved in the discussions reject the possibility of cooperation with Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo, who has announced he will run for prime minister in the next elections as head of a centrist party.

Lubotzky said last week the Third Way should organize with other individuals and groups "such as Meridor and his supporters, Vilna'i and the [liberal-religious] Meimad movement, and together offer the Israeli voter a centrist option so he will not have to choose only between Bibi [Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu] and Barak."

Harel has said explicitly that "I will not be in the vicinity of Roni Milo or [Gesher leader] David Levy."

Harel added he would like to work with "members of the kibbutz movements, residents of development towns, religious people who object to religious coercion and religious legislation, and people who have despaired of the big parties."

Meanwhile, Meridor has not made a final decision to leave Likud. He's waiting to see if it will be possible to depose Netanyahu as party leader, and will only leave the party if convinced that it's impossible.

Hamilton sluggers prevail in Winnipeg slo-pitch tourney

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A team from Hamilton won the 20th annual Labor Day weekend B'nai Brith Jewish Men's International Slo-Pitch Tournament while Toronto's entry finished out of the playoffs with a 1-5 record.

This was the first time that the tournament was held in Winnipeg and it promised to be the largest to date. The Air Canada strike, however, almost spelled disaster. Howie Gilmore, one of the co-ordinators, says he had to play "travel agent" to make sure it came off.

The tournament attracted teams from Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Detroit, Edmonton and first time entrants from Vancouver and Minneapolis. Five local teams also competed.

Gilmore reports that the tournament generally attracts 12 to 16 teams. In the first few years, it was strictly an eastern Canadian competition (with the exception of Detroit). Toronto alone has over 200 teams.

Teams from Winnipeg and Edmonton first competed in the 1986 tournament in Burlington, Ont. The Toronto entry this year was put together for the tournament from players from different teams.

It was Gilmore and his long time Winnipeg Goldeyes teammate Howie Shapiro who took the initiative in bringing the annual international tournament to Winnipeg this year for the first time. Each year, during the competition, team captains meet and one city volunteers to host the tournament for the next year. Last year's games were held in Ottawa and Toronto volunteerd to host next year's tournament.

On the field itself, the games were blessed with a beautiful, sunny weekend. The team from Montreal won the A Division with a 5-1 record. The Winnipeg Commishes finished second behind with a 4-2 record. Gilmore and Shapiro's Goldeyes finished fourth at 3-3 just behind 4-2 Detroit and 1-5 Toronto. The Winnipeg Diamonds finished in last place in Division A with six losses and no wins.

The Minneapolis team won the B Division with five wins and a tie just ahead of Hamilton with four wins, a loss and a tie. The Vancouver team, half of whose members are former Winnipeggers, finished third at 4-2 while the two other Winnipeg entries, the Sweepers and the Whips both finished at 2 and 4 with Edmonton trailing the field.

The Commishes were the only Winnipeg team to make the semi-finals losing to Minneapolis while Hamilton beat Montreal in the other semi-final. Hamilton beat Minneapolis in the final by a score of 9-5 to win its first championship.

Memo to HaShem

Memo to; HaShem
From; Gabriel Malach (the angel)
Re: Annual Report – 5758 (29 Elul)

On behalf of the Senior Management Group (SMG) and all the angels in head office, I am pleased to be reporting once again on our Rosh Hashanah preparations, as well as to provide you with our annual world report as per the SMG's performance contract.

Last Laugh

Firstly, let me assure you that all preparations have been completed as per your directions. The tshuvah committee in the Chosen People division has been working quite hard to make this our best Rosh Hashanah ever. Numerous improvements have been made since last year.

Firstly, all individual appointments with you have been scheduled, including both your human and heavenly subjects. Please do your best to keep to the schedule. To better assist you, all personal files have been opened, and 5759 forecasts have been drafted for all of your human subjects, although they may be revised at your discretion, should penitents achieve the appropriate tshuvah thresholds (see tshuvah manual, policy 0202-04).

Two tanker trucks full of Din and Rachmonis are ready for your use as you see fit. The Book of Judgement's software has been upgraded and Avraham Avinu (#114) has been able to install considerably more RAM. We are ready to assist as you require, subject to the work breaks stipulated in our Collective Agreement.

We have again hired Leviathan Caterers for your annual sponsored kiddush. Naturally, they are under your kashrut supervision.

Turning to the state of the world: as you know (of course), things were extremely challenging and busy for us this past year. I wish to stress that as a bureaucracy, we were in no way, shape or form, responsible for the following items this past year: the collapse of the Russian ruble and banking system; worldwide stock market meltdowns; delays in the Middle East peace process; the Lewinsky/Clinton/Starr episode; the movie Spiceworld; the return of bell-bottoms and the Volkswagen Beetle; the entire Swiss Bank scandal; the Quebec secession debate; the falling Canadian dollar; the Asian economic failure; America OnLine; the Y2K Bug; Cuba; Iraq; North Korea; Bosnia; or Libya. These are, of course, the sole jurisdiction of Chaos Incorporated, our offshore competitor.

As for the functioning of your faithful bureaucracy, I am pleased to report that all divisions are functioning at full capacity. Briefly, your Chosen People division reports a record number of simchot and conversions, but regrets that intermarriage is also way up. A special task force has been struck to investigate.

The mitzvah department reports substantial growth in activity, while unfortunately, the Aveiros department also reports substantial growth. The Moshiach preparations department is extremely pleased to report that after considerable effort, Oreos went kosher this year. As in every other year, Operation Moshiach is ready, awaiting your approval and fiscal resourcing.

Malach Resources division reports that a strike of the Angels' union was narrowly averted due to successful re-negotiation of the collective agreement. As a result, angels (levels 1-3) will receive shorter work weeks and 10 more minutes in Olam Habah, plus three weeks vacation, not to be taken during yamim tovim. Of particular note is the early retirement of the Tooth Fairy.

You will recall she filed for long term disability benefits due to wear and tear, which she attributes to the inflationary pressure of payments and the conversion of many currencies from paper to coins. We will be recruiting for her replacement shortly. The business and accounting division reports a balanced budget, yet again, through the introduction of initiation and building fund fees for our newest members. This was necessary to offset the Tooth Fairy claim and increased payments for children's teeth.

In closing, overall, it was a very busy and challenging year. We seek your forgiveness for our errors not due to lack of training or proper supervision, and look forward to the coming year in serving you with professionalism and ceaseless devotion. Amen. Selah.

MARTIN & FRAN CAPLAN EXTEND BEST WISHES FOR A HAPPY & HEALTHY NEW YEAR

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

My first few weeks of high school have been a blast! I am making new friends, enjoying my classes and having a great time. I was even invited to go to a party on Saturday night and everyone in my grade was there. A lot of them were smoking cigarettes and I was offered one. I gave in and tried it and it was so disgusting! I couldn't stop coughing and I felt like I was going to throw up! It was gross and I never ever want to try it again. How can I say no to people who ask if I want a cigarette without sounding like a complete loser?

IR

Dear IR,

While you are a teenager a lot of kids will experiment with various substances that are bad for their health, ranging from smoking to drugs. It is important to remember that these things are bad for you as well as illegal to have and use. No one will think of you differently if you don't smoke. You have to find the courage within yourself to say no to the offers of a cigarette.

Although this may seem like a cliché, it really is true that people who think differently of you solely because you do not smoke are people who are not worthy of your friendship. You will see that once many of your friends realize that smoking is very bad for their health and wellbeing, they will quit. You are going to find that there are many people in your group of friends who also do not smoke and you will be able to stick with these people when everyone else is smoking.

It now seems like you will be branded a loser for not smoking with your friends, but your friends will eventually look at you with respect for sticking to your beliefs and not succumbing to the peer pressure. What is most important is that you stay true to yourself and not do anything that you don't feel right about doing.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Old reminiscences and new experiences

One of the three special prelude prayers to the sounding of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah deals with Zichronot, remembrances.

The liturgist who wrote the prayer uses the device of God's memory as a spiritual and even a physical tie binding all humanity, indeed all manner of life, through time and place into a metaphysical unity that affirms the goodness and the importance of this world.

The passages of Zichronot are a testament to a God who acts in history. There is a purpose and a plan to life. The destinies of individuals, of His people and of all humanity are the underlying essence of creation.

"You remember what has been achieved in the universe and what has been created since the earliest of times...

The memory of all creatures passes before you...their deeds, their thoughts and aspirations..."

In this year's Rosh Hashanah supplement, we too have focussed on zichronot. We have published the personal reminiscences of 18 individuals relating to their own Rosh Hashanah celebrations 50 years ago, the first Rosh Hashanah of the modern State of Israel era.

We are proud to present these private zichronot to our readers. From Yehuda Amichai's succinct, ironic recollections as a young soldier on brief leave from the fighting in the Negev Desert to save the life of the nascent state of Israel to Larry Zolf's colorful memories of his family's life in Winnipeg, the 18 reminiscences describe people, events and emotions from vastly different parts of the Jewish world 50 years ago.

"And God said: I remember too the splendor of your youth..."

We are also featuring in this supplement a visual depiction of more recent memories. We have published the 10 "winners" in the 50th Anniversary Photo Contest sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, the Canada Israel Experience Centre and El Al.

The photos, such as the one above by Jen Arron, are both a representation of and an inspiration for the zichronot of a new generation, most of them stepping upon Israel's soil for the first time, many of them reaching out toward Israel as a new marker and possibly a turning point in their young, evolving lives. The connection with the land, the sense of discovery and the sheer exhilaration of fun leap from the photographs of these travelling 15-to 24-year-olds.

The special prayer of the Zichronot ends with the following passage, (excerpted and precised from the machzor):

"O Lord, God of our fathers, remember us well, with good memories...

For you remember all the things that have been forgotten since ancient times;

You do not let memory slip..."

Though imperfect, indeed even flawed, our memories are our personal weavers' tools helping us to thread our lives to those who have preceded us and to leave a strand for those that are still to follow.

The liturgist who wrote the Zichronot prayer in the machzor understood this well. He movingly describes that thread and the pattern of its celestial stitch intertwining God to His people and one generation to another.

We hope you enjoy this Rosh Hashanah supplement.

Best Wishes for a Happy New Year

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5759

There was no hiding war from my mother

By YEHUDA AMICHAI

Our Palmach battalion (the 7th) was taken out of the Negev where we had been for many months, cut off from the rest of the new country – together with a few heroic kibbutzim like Negba – holding the Negev against a vastly superior Egyptian army.

The enemy had tanks, artillery and war planes; we had only light weapons. The remnants of our batallion were flown out to the north by World War II Dakota planes. We were put in a camp not far from Tel Aviv and received fresh reinforcements, whom we trained for the next large operation – the biggest of the War of Independence – the liberation of the south and the defeat of the Egyptian army.

This was to start two days after Yom Kippur. Thus, we were ordered to move to the south into battle position for the offensive. But first, we got a few hours leave.

I went to see my parents, who were staying with my sister in Tel Aviv. I parked the jeep a few streets away from their synagogue, and I went straight into the women's section. My father was under the belief from what I had told him that it would take quite a few weeks until our batallion would be ready for action. My mother went home with me and said: "I know for sure that the big offensive will start very soon. Don't lie to me."

My mother was very Orthodox like my father. She even wore a sheitl. When we arrived home, she suddenly took out food and put it on the table. I was shocked. Although I had left Orthodoxy in my mid-teens, it was still Yom Kippur.

She said, "Eat, eat. If God cannot prevent wars, he has no right to make us fast."

I ate and went back to my batallion. Two days later, the big offensive started.

Yehuda Amichai is considered by many to be Israel's poet laureate.

In his reminiscence, Yehuda Amichai describes the period of time and the precarious physical situation of the young state that are depcited in this photo. We see a convoy of home-made armored vehicles running the Arab gauntlet on the way to re-supply a besieged Jerusalem in 1948.

A dramatic and theatrical experience

By MANNY BATSHAW

Although my parents led mostly secular lives after they immigrated to Montreal, they were religious in their practices on holidays, especially Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. For me, as a child, those holidays were a dramatic and a theatrical experience.

In our neighborhood, there was only one very small synagogue, which had no rabbi or cantor. Therefore, for the High Holy Days my parents would purchase tickets to services, which were conducted each year in the Théâtre Monument Nationale building on Ste. Catherine Street East near St. Lawrence Boulevard. At the time, we lived on Parthenais Street near Notre Dame — where my mother operated a small grocery store or what would be called a depanneur today in our renovated living room. So Rosh Hashanah, in my memory, will always be associated with the very long three-mile walk to the Monument Nationale and, of course, with the long trek home after services, a practice to be repeated on the following days of the Yamim Noraim or the High Holy Days.

The Théâtre Monument Nationale is an immense and ornate building, particularly for a small child. I vividly recall climbing 40 stairs of a wide, stately staircase to enter the parterre of the theatre and then there was still another long flight of stairs to get to our seats in the balcony. The bimah for the services was the stage of the theatre, which was surrounded by the highly sculptured proscenium arch. The stage also contained an impressive Aron Kodesh ark.

The congregation for the High Holy Days numbered about 1,000 people. The shul theatre was standing room only. It was always packed and while children were free to roam around, my lasting impression is that the services were rather decorous. This could be attributed to the famous berimter cantor. But it wasn't just the respect and adulation that made most of the people there listen with rapt attention, it was the desire to absorb the meaning of the prayers these talented cantors were chanting.

My father, Tuvieh, received a religious education in Russia and was capable of reciting Shacharit service from memory. Yet he was also a conscientious socialist. I was told that when he was courting my mother, Golda, he would visit her before going to synagogue on Shabbat, carrying his tallit bag. But instead of going to shul as he was expected to do, he went to a Socialist meeting in the woods. When my father left Russia and arrived in Montreal in 1903, he continued his Socialist activities at the Workmen's Circle, Branch 203, where he eventually became president.

But even though my father did not consider himself a religious man, he was always keenly interested in cantoral music, which is why every year he would walk many miles, with his young family, to hear berimter chazonim like Yossele Rosenblatt, Zavel Kwartin, Ephraim Shlepak and others.

I've inherited this love of music from him and while I enjoy opera, it's always been true for me that any opportunity I have to listen to a famous cantor motivates me still to walk (or drive now) many miles to hear him.

For me, the High Holy Days, Rosh Hashanah in particular, are still a communal and religious experience. As I think back to my parents, to the observance in our home of shlogging kapores, kashrut, doing good deeds and going to shul, I realize that my father, despite his socialism, really exemplified the pintelle yid. Rosh Hashanah was more than just operatic singing for him, just as it has always been for me. It was, indeed, a religious experience.

This recollection will be contained in a biography of Manny Batshaw tentatively titled, Love Affair: People and Community, The Story of Manny Batshaw, which is being written by Montreal author Joel Yanofsky and which is due to be published in the spring of 1999.

Israel long part of my 'mental environment'

By MAURICE BENZACAR

Even though it was not until 1971 that I first set foot on Israel soil, Israel had been part of my "mental environment" since the 1940s.

When I was a child in Morocco, my mother often said to me: "If I don't see Jerusalem with my own eyes, I hope you will see it for me."

Every year, at the end of the Pesach seder, when we sang, "L'Shanah Haba'ah b'Yerushalayim," my heart flew over to Jerusalem, a city that was so dear and so familiar, yet so distant.

I was a Zionist, as was everyone else in the community. Our Zionism came from our heart, our mind and our prayers. It was a mystic, spiritual, religious feeling that had always been kept alive in Sephardi communities all over the world. It was quite different from the intellectual, political, left-wing Labor-Zionism of our brothers and sisters of eastern Europe, but no less real or powerful.

I remember May 14, 1948, the day of the creation of the State of Israel. It is one of my dearest memories: all of us sitting around the radio, counting the votes of the UN Assembly. The relief, the pride and the general sense of euphoria that we felt remain beyond description.

Soon afterwards, the Jewish Agency began sending representatives to Morocco to recruit young men and women to make aliyah to Israel. I remember, every motza'ei Shabbat, we would sit around the radio and listen to the program Kol Tzion la gola, during which people who had settled in Israel greeted us, chatted with us and encouraged us to make aliyah.

I was only a child when, on Oct. 4, 1948 (29 Elul 5708), we celebrated the first Rosh Hashanah as free people, a people with a land, the land promised to us by God Almighty. Walking to the synagogue in the streets of Marrakesh, we had to contain our joy. When we met other Jews, we made no mention of this unbelievable event, we just said: Shanah Tovah, Tizkou l'shanim rabot, hugged and kissed, but in our synagogue, our happiness, our pride and our gratitude to God and to all these brave young soldiers who gave their life so we could live these moments of unspeakable happiness knew no bounds.

I remember our rabbi, Rebbe Haim Shoushana, looking resplendent in his white caftan and white kippah; the synagogue was overflowing with enormous bunches of fragrant flowers and home-made flags of Israel. People in their best attire were overjoyed, and everyone that day, rich and poor, young and old, was wearing their most precious pieces of jewelry and expressing their pride with radiant smiles.

The rabbi gave us time to greet each other, to express our feelings, to hug and kiss again. Finally, we calmed down and the service started. Never before had we prayed with such fervor, nor sang with such joy in our voice and gratitude in our heart! The atmosphere was so electric, people were ecstatic!

Then the rabbi delivered his sermon. It was hard for him to speak, because every time he said the words: Eretz Yisrael or Chaialei Tzahal (the soldiers of the Israeli army), the women above sitting in the balcony would start their ululating, and the children would join in this beautiful chorus of drunken happiness. These joyous interruptions reminded me of our angry interruptions on Purim, when we used to boo every time the name Haman was pronounced.

I still remember that sermon. After greeting us all, the rabbi thanked God for allowing us to celebrate the first Rosh Hashanah in 2,000 years as free, proud Jews, with a land of our own, a beloved land that had been taken away from us, but that God had given us back.

He quoted Isaiah 11:11: "And it shall come to pass on that day that the Lord will set his hand again to recover the remnant of his people that shall remain from Assyria and from Egypt…and from Cush…and he will assemble the dispersed of Israel and gather together the scattered of Judah from the four corners of the earth;" and Jeremiah 31:8 "Behold, I will bring them from the north countries and gather them from the uttermost parts of the earth …;" and Ezekiel 36:24: "For I will take you from among the nations and gather you out of all the countries and will bring you into your own land…"

He reserved the most eloquent, most moving part of his sermon for the young soldiers who had fallen in the battlefield. There was not a dry eye in the synagogue. A few people had lost a son or a relative, a friend or a neighbor in the War of Independence. The rabbi's voice cracked more than once.

My mind wandered and I imagined myself as one of those soldiers, fighting valiantly, knowing no fear in the first line. I clung to my father constantly and held his hand very tightly. I wanted to make sure I was not going to wake up from this wonderful dream. But no, it was not a dream, it was a gift, a wonderful

Old new home a refuge for child survivors

By DR. JOSEPH BURG

Mordechai Ben-Dat, the editor of The Canadian Jewish News, asked me to write a personal reminiscence of Rosh Hashanah 1948.

The truth is that on May 14 in 1948 Medinat Yisrael was proclaimed, and so Rosh Hashanah 1948 was the first Rosh Hashanah in the existing and exciting new State of Israel.

The Mizrachi World Organization, and its unforgettable leader Rav Meir Berlin Bar Ilan, decided in 1946 to open up a European Centre on behalf of World Mizrachi for rescue, help and education work with the remnants of the concentration camps, displaced persons and those coming from Asian and European Russia, Poland and the Underground.

I was elected in 1946 to be the central shaliach for Europe because in 1939-40, the first year of World War II, I was working with the Haganah in the Aliyah Bet immigration to then-Palestine. Leaving Switzerland in August 1940, I went home to Eretz Yisrael via Lisbon. In Mozambique, I was waiting for seven weeks but was not allowed to enter South Africa. Via Entebbe, I arrived in Eretz Yisrael in December 1940.

After the war, the Mizrachi movement was active in Shearit Hapletah in Europe for the purpose of the rehabilitation and the reconstruction of the remnants. We founded Talmud Torah schools in the camps. We brought Jewish children out of monasteries, helped build mikvahs, and organized chapters of the movement in many cities in Germany, Austria and Italy. My throat is still overworked from the first Bnei Akiva convention that we held in Germany in 1947. We sent young people to the Alps of Switzerland to be healed of tuberculosis.

It was only natural that I and my wife Rivka went for Rosh Hashanah 1948 to one of our children's homes where we did a lot of educational work to give moral support and Jewish knowledge to those young-gift that the good Lord had finally sent us, in keeping with his promise.

Marrakesh celebration

Back home for dinner, the house was beautiful, the table bountiful, and the atmosphere was the atmosphere of a bar mitzvah or a henna or a wedding: rejoicing, singing, eating, drinking until the wee hours of the morning. Finally, the children were sent to bed, because we had to catch a few hours of sleep before heading back to the synagogue for the morning service.

I will always remember that marvellous day, I often think of it, especially on Rosh Hashanah. Every Rosh Hashanah takes me back to the Rosh Hashanah of Elul 29, 5708, in Marrakesh. I pray that soon, very soon, we will celebrate a Rosh Hashanah of peace and harmony with our Arab neighbors and cousins. Amen.

Holocaust and Hope

sters (14 to 17 years) that survived.

I don't remember if we were the first Medina Rosh Hashanah in our Children's Home in Switzerland or in Belgium. Anyway, for this Rosh Hashanah I brought some of our shlichim from the different countries, so we had a minyan. I myself functioned as a part-time substitute chazzan. At the table, in as festive a way as possible, my wife Rivka helped with Israeli songs.

Our feeling there was: Eretz Yisrael and Medinat Yisrael. The old new home was a refuge for displaced persons, for the survivors of the Shoah. We took care of the children. Almost none of these children had a father or mother who survived. The longing and belonging to Medinat Yisrael was a remedy for many of the ills.

At this Rosh Hashanah service I had to give the "sermon." Quite understandably, the leitmotif was: Holocaust and Hope. Looking back on the Holocaust years, I spoke about life and death from the individual point of view and from the national point of view. I referred to the words of Isaiah (43:2), "When you pass through water I will be with you, through streams; they shall not overwhelm you. When you walk through fire, you shall not be scorched; through flame, it shall not burn you." Our medieval commentators interpreted this verse as speaking about the dangers of the auto-da-fe, the burning of Jews in the time of the Spanish Inquisition. That was our thinking when we said the sublime words of Unetaneh Tokef.

The Shoah atrocities gave new interpretations to those words. So I mentioned the furnaces of Auschwitz, the gas chambers and the manifold ways of destruction and annihilation.

Looking back on this first Medina Rosh Hashanah, surely I was interpreting the words of the sublime prayer with the historical experience of our people in the medieval time and in the Shoah epoch. But I did not know that those words of Rabbi Amnon of Mainz have also an existential meaning for today in Medinat Yisrael.

We pray for the life of the State, which is surrounded by enemies. We pray for the lives of our soldiers — those sitting in airplanes, those sitting in tanks, those sitting in warships and submarines and those defending our borders, mi b'esh, mi b'mayim, mi b'kitzo, umi loh b'kitzi.

We are fighting for survival, but we are not allowed to forget that we are also here struggling for the revival of Jewish culture, tradition and values.

Many times we don't see the boundaries between cold peace, cold war and the climbing political temperature. Every one of our beloved soldiers and settlers are included in our prayer.

There are heavy clouds in our political sky. The dissension within the nation concerning basic political and cultural issues is most detrimental to us, not the least because these disagreements are exploited by our enemies.

This Rosh Hashanah, 50 years after the founding of the State of Israel, demands intensive soul searching, perhaps more than ever. I would suggest we always remember the precepts from the Sayings of the Fathers (3:1) and act accordingly. They are: The Sense of History, the Sense of Direction and the Sense of Responsibility.

Dr. Josef Burg is one of Israel's acknowledged elder statesmen. He served in every government until 1986.

A time for new beginnings in Toronto

By DONALD CARR

The chartered Trans-Canada Airlines North Star touched down at Malton Airport. It was Sept. 8, 1948.

The plane had left London, stopping at Prestwick, Reykjavik and Goose Bay to refuel. There had been a fire in the hydraulic system in the middle of the night before reaching Goose Bay, but the crew had extinguished it with little trouble and no alarm. The floorboards were torn up to get at the source of the fire. I think I was the only passenger awake. The experience – on my first flight ever – is probably the cause of the "white-knuckle" flying that still remains with me.

At Malton, the four-engine converted DC-6 disembarked its passengers – all of us Ontario-government-sponsored immigrants from the United Kingdom, part of then-premier George Drew's effort to increase the Anglo-Saxon population of his province.

I had just been demobilized from the British army. During my service, I had been stationed in London, as part of a small unit that looked after the pay and rations of all the British army officers seconded to the Control Commission for Germany after the war. Not living in barracks, but with friends in North London, I had spent almost two years co-editing Young Israel, the monthly magazine of the Federation of Zionist Youth.

When three British sergeants had been hanged in Palestine by Lehi, in retaliation for the execution of Dov Gruner, one of their members, I had been maligned by my sergeant major, a strapping 6-footer in the Welsh Guards. He excoriated me in traditional army metaphor for what "your people" had done. As we were alone in the orderly room at the time, I gave him as good as he gave me – knowing that there were no witnesses to what surely would have been a court-martial offence.

My big decision – once I knew that I would leave England, where I saw no future for a then budding newspaper reporter – had been whether I should go to the new State of Israel, for which I had campaigned and worked both before and after my army call-up, or whether I should go to Toronto, where all my father's brothers, sisters and their families lived. I opted for Canada. Had I decided otherwise, I would probably have found myself living at Cherev Le'Et, a moshav shitufi near Netanya, sponsored by the Federation of Zionist Youth.

I was welcomed by family at the Salvation Army headquarters on Sherbourne Street in Toronto, where we new immigrants had been taken by bus from the airport. In addition to the natural concerns about an unknown future, two things were bothering me.

The first was the constant roar in my ears, the after effects of the four Rolls Royce Merlin engines on the plane to which I had been exposed for some 15 hours. The second was where I would daven on Rosh Hashanah, just a few days away. Time cured the roar, but not for almost a week! My aunt quickly assured me that she and my uncle had a seat for me for Rosh Hashanah at their shul. Great was my relief.

Acclimatizing myself to the Toronto heat, the different and offensive odor of the exhaust of the cars and trucks and stepping off a sidewalk and looking the "wrong" way, I looked forward eagerly to the holiday. At home, in Cheltenham, my father and I were the only kohanim in a congregation which was Orthodox – as was the shul which we had attended in

A new beginning

Leeds, my place of birth and where we lived until I was seven.

Rosh Hashanah came. To my surprise we were driving to shul. When we arrived, my uncle parked the car in the lot adjacent to an austere, grey building with Ivy climbing its walls. With my yarmulke and tallit in hand, I climbed the steps to the front doors and entered.

Strains of organ music struck my ears. I looked around. The sanctuary was filling quickly. Men and women were sitting together. There was not a yarmulke or tallit to be seen! I remarked on this to my aunt.

"Oh, our shul is a Reform temple," she said, "and not many men wear them."

Naive me! I had never before been inside a synagogue that was not Orthodox. I felt uncomfortable and decided not to put on my yarmulke or tallit.

With Rabbi Abraham Feinberg officiating, the service – unlike present-day Reform practice – had hardly a word of Hebrew, except for the hymns. They were led by a chazzan who faced the congregation, with his back to the Ark and by a mixed choir in the balcony, accompanied by the organ.

What an awakening! While in the Army Cadet Force I had been to a Protestant Church of England service. The proceedings at Holy Blossom Temple seemed to me to be closer to that than to the synagogue I had attended all my young life. I was lost for words and I could not bring myself to read the prayers aloud. I had no sense of praying, although I soon realized how meaningful the service was for those, like this branch of my Toronto family, who were members of the Reform movement. Of course, in later years the form of service changed. Much more Hebrew is used now and most men wear yarmulkes and tallitot.

That first morning, I remembered that another uncle had told me that for the second day I would worship with him and his family at his shul. I was filled with curiosity as to what this other new experience would bring.

Theirs turned out to be the Shaw Street Shul, replete with a mechitzah separating men from women, the hubbub of Orthodox prayer, devoid of organ or choir and – except for different tunes for some of the prayers – an atmosphere to which I was accustomed.

Almost the only similarity between the two services was the sermon, for both rabbis spoke about the nascent, besieged Jewish state and the need for support.

Rosh Hashanah 1948 – the first year of Israel's existence – was thus for me quite unforgettable. It was, in effect, an introduction to a new and fulfilling life in a country whose bounty I have been privileged to share. At the same time, I have had the zchut to contribute in my own way to the building of its Jewish community, and indirectly to some extent, to the well-being of the State of Israel where I could have been living today, if I had not made another decision 50 years ago.

Hospital celebrations in Austria

By MENDEL GOOD

I celebrated Rosh Hashanah 1948 in Ebensee, a town in Austria where I was liberated by the Americans.

I was in the hospital suffering from tuberculosis and typhoid fever and participated in organizing services in the hospital.

We had Jewish doctors and I remember their names: Dr. Goldenberg, Dr. Wald, Dr. Gross, Dr. Laks. There were also two Jewish nurses. Bronka Dzia Lowska is the only one I recall.

We had people who were able to conduct the service.

The hospital authorities gave us a room for the High Holy Days so that we could conduct the services with dignity.

The atmosphere was filled with emotion.

As I recall, there was a great deal of crying and asking of questions that had no answers.

In my hospital pyjamas, I went to the displaced persons camp to get a shofar, after they had finished using it.

The machzorim, Torah and shofar, were provided by the Joint Distribution Committee.

IDF pioneers lived history

By AURA HERZOG

The first Rosh Hashanah in the State of Israel was indeed a new beginning – not just of a new year, but of a new chapter in the life of our people. As we ushered in the year 5709, we marked so many firsts – for the state, for its government, for its army and for its people.

For my husband, Chaim Herzog, and me, that first year was interwoven with the ups and downs of our new state's military fortunes. I worked in the scientific warfare unit of the fledgling IDF, where my boss, the renowned scientist Aharon Katzir, concentrated on developing fighting tools from primitive supplies. Pharmacies across Jerusalem were called upon to provide the raw materials for what would become Molotov cocktails, a staple in our arsenal during the war.

Chaim would soon be appointed the first head of military intelligence. His challenge would be the development of a professional intelligence capacity to aid the army in its battle efforts. The War of Independence raged, with two truces – between June 11 and July 9, and between July 18 and Oct. 15. Our personal lives as newlyweds were subsumed in the historical drama unfolding before our eyes, in which we participated. To quote from the title of Chaim's biography, we were, indeed, "living history."

Several recollections stand out for me as I think back to those tumultuous days.

On May 14, 1948 itself, as the state was declared by Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, I was at the office of the scientific warfare unit. Having just recovered from injuries and shock suffered in the bombing of the Jewish Agency a few months earlier, I was worried about my husband in the front line. We turned on the radio and listened with bated breath. Nobody knew what the name of the state would be, and we were thrilled that its name was Israel. There we were in embattled Jerusalem, with the Arab armies' siege closing in around us. Nevertheless, we were elated. Our excitement and joy were indescribable.

During the first truce, Chaim came to take me out of Jerusalem. At the time, the city was besieged, with hardly any food or water. In his uniform, Chaim hid a precious supply of cigarettes for his father, Chief Rabbi Isaac Herzog. Later, my father-in-law would make them last by cutting them into little butts, which he smoked.

We left Jerusalem via the new Burma Road, which Chaim had helped create in the hills leading to Jerusalem, as an alternative, safe route. Along the way, we encountered men unloading stacks of supplies, and literally carrying them into Jerusalem on their backs because the road had not yet been linked.

We returned to Jerusalem during the second truce, and celebrated Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot there. Jerusalem and Tel Aviv were worlds apart. The first, most striking difference was the freedom with which water was consumed in Tel Aviv. In Jerusalem, the besieged city, water, the most precious commodity, was rationed accordingly. Our daily ration was one meager cup of water per individual. Food was in short supply, and during the siege, people literally cooked weeds for meals. But there was no panic. Jerusalemites were stoic and determined.

They took London during the blitz of a few years earlier as their example and inspiration. The agenda in Jerusalem was simply survival. In contrast, Tel Aviv throbbed with the pulse of the national effort. The government and army were headquartered there throughout the first year, and for the sake of national morale, Tel Aviv tried to function normally.

When I first came to Tel Aviv from besieged Jerusalem, the culture shock disturbed me. Sitting at a dinner party as if life was normal was jarring for someone who had just left the bleak, harsh reality of Jerusalem.

Another vivid recollection is the luncheon I held for my brother-in-law Abba Eban, then our newly appointed ambassador to the UN and Washington. Eban, who was on a brief visit to Israel, wanted to meet Yigal Allon, the army's brilliant senior commander in the Negev region, so as to get a first-hand briefing on the military situation. There was no food to be had. Chaim was at the central military base in Hulda, and it was there that I was able to obtain a live chicken for the meal. I had never even held one, and I wondered how I could arrange for it to be kosher-slaughtered, plucked and prepared for cooking. In all my many ensuing decades of entertaining, including 10 years in the presidency, this was the most difficult assignment.

An unforgettable memory is of my first encounter with a battlefield, just a few hours after the fighting stopped. In late October, Operation Hiram for the liberation of the Galilee, led by (Canadian) Ben Dunkelman and the Seventh Brigade, had just ended. Chaim was called back from his leave, and I spontaneously joined him. Not much of a romantic trip, with both of us in uniform…There, for the first time, I saw the horrors of battle, as we surveyed the charred remains of people and animals in the fields around Sasa.

Israel in that first year was at its best. This epic struggle was "to be or not to be." The dream of 2,000 years was at stake. To fulfil the promise, people were prepared to sacrifice everything and do anything.

Looking back, I realize how many of our worries and crises over the last 50 years pale in comparison to the challenge before us then. There was enormous spirit. Our wish to win and to prevail was extraordinary. We weren't going to be beaten.

Aura Herzog is the wife of Chaim Herzog, Israel's sixth president. She served as a lieutenant in the IDF during the War of Independence.

Réflexions de Naïm Kattan

NAÏM KATTAN

C'était ma première année à Paris. En août 1947, j'avais quitté Bagdad grâce à une bourse du gouvernement français. Quelques mois plus tard, ce fut la naissance de l'État d'Israël. Les juifs de Bagdad constituaient près du quart de la population de la ville. Au cours des années précédentes, ils étaient sujets aux ennuis et aux vexations des autorités. Après la naissance d'Israël le harcèlement de la police s'était appesanti. S'ils voulaient partir, il fallait qu'ils laissent de fortes sommes qui garantiraient leur retour. Notre communauté, fondée par les prisonniers de Nabucatnetsar à Babylone, vieille de vingt-cinq siècles, était bien intégrée à la vie du pays. Elle comptait non seulement des commerçants et des artisans mais un nombre considérable de fonctionnaires, de médecins, d'ingénieurs et de journalistes.

À Paris, me sachant seul, un des copains que j'ai connu à l'Association des étudiants juifs, m'invita dans sa famille pour célébrer Roch Hachanah et Yom Kippour. La veille de Roch Hachanah, avant de me rendre chez lui, je suis allé à la synagogue de la Victoire. Immense temple qui me semblait plus proche des églises qui parsemaient la ville qu'aux synagogues de Bagdad. J'avais vécu un judaïsme intime, familial. À peine s'il avait conscience de lui-même. Nous étions juifs comme les autres étaient chrétiens ou musulmans. Nous mangions cacher sans nous poser de questions et nous allions naturellement à la synagogue le chabbat et les jours des fêtes. Nous étions, certes, différents mais les autres aussi l'étaient et nous ne cherchions pas à nous distinguer.

À Paris, je découvrais, petit à petit, une communauté qui ne s'affichait pas. La guerre et surtout l'occupation étaient trop proches pour qu'on n'ait pas peur d'être découvert et dénoncé. D'où le désir, peut-être inconscient, de se cacher, de passer inaperçu. Je ne pouvais pas encore reconnaître les noms ashkénazes et, de par leurs patronymes, les juifs étaient aussi étrangers pour moi que les autres Français.

À la Sorbonne, où je faisais mes études, il m'était souvent arrivé de dire que j'étais juif, car, Irakien, on me prenait pour un musulman, et deux ou trois fois, des étudiants me répondaient: moi aussi! Puis, quand la conversation se prolongeait, prenant un caractère personnel, j'écoutais le récit, toujours douloureux, des pertes et des disparitions encore récentes. D'une manière ou d'une autre, tous mes interlocuteurs juifs étaient des miraculés.

Ce soir-là, dans la synagogue, des sièges étaient encore disponibles à l'arrière. Je cherchais, dans le siddour, la page que mon père avait l'habitude de m'indiquer. Notre hébreu était rocailleux, proche de l'origine, à proximité de l'arabe. Ici, la prononciation des consonnes mais aussi des voyelles me semblait différente, déformée. Ainsi, on pouvait être juif autrement.

Je ne reconnaissais personne dans la salle. À la synagogue de Bagdad, j'avais l'habitude de retrouver camarades de classe, cousins, oncles et tantes. Là j'étais seul, inconnu. Dès que je tardais à tourner la page, perdu dans la recherche d'un texte introuvable, mon voisin, sans prononcer un mot, me l'indiquait. Me prenait-il, à l'instar de mon père, pour un enfant ou, peut-être plus simplement, pour un étranger, cherchant la parole dans une nouvelle contrée? Malgré son apparente étrangeté, il était assurément un juif. Ce voisin inconnu était donc un proche. Sentiment nouveau et exaltant. Par les récits que j'écoutais, je ressentais l'abîme tragique qui avait englouti dans son tourbillon tant de juifs. En contrepartie, il y avait heureusement, des juifs bien vivants, qui sortaient de l'anonymat. Sans connaître mon nom, mon voisin m'indiquait l'inscription de notre commune parole, de notre commune lecture. Il appartenait à une communauté que je découvrais, que je voulais faire mienne, à laquelle je souhaitais appartenir.

Mon copain habitait rue de Flandre, à l'époque quartier pauvre ou, du moins, populaire. Je cherchais dans ma mémoire d'enfant, les équivalents des mets de la célébration de l'année nouvelle. Seul dans l'immense ville, j'étais cependant chaleureusement accueilli. Je déchiffrais, peu à peu, les codes de l'intimité familiale, la manière de rendre grâce, de dire la joie. Autour de moi, des rescapés qui quelques années auparavant se cachaient, taisaient scrupuleusement leur identité, vivaient quotidiennement dans la terreur d'une dénonciation.

Cette année était cependant différente de toutes les autres. Le père de mon ami inventa une bénédiction, récita le chehehiyanou pour la naissance de notre État, l'État d'Israël. "Allons-nous nous y rendre?" demanda la jeune soeur de mon copain. "Nous y réfléchissons" répondit sa mère. Tout au long de la soirée, on commentait les dernières nouvelles d'Israël, la joie prenant le pas sur la tristesse de compter encore les morts, de subir encore des sacrifices. Je cherchais vainement à chasser de mon esprit les ombres, les pages sombres qui me submergeaient. J'imaginais comment ma famille vivait cette nuit de renouveau, de grande attente et d'immense espoir, la joie qui, assombrie par la peur et la menace, ne pouvait s'exprimer que dans la clandestinité et le silence. La mémoire du Farhoud, le pogrom qui s'abattit sur la communauté juive de Bagdad en 1941, était encore vivace. En esprit, je m'appliquais à évoquer les années qui ont suivi, l'espoir en dépit des vexations, l'attente d'une délivrance qui allait certainement venir mais qui tardait, qui tardait. Mais ce soir, nous étions tous unis dans la joie. Nous célébrions librement, dans l'exaltation, le grand événement. Enfin un pays qui allait ouvrir pour nous ses portes.

Mon ami Yéhouda m'envoyait les journaux de Bagdad. Chaque paquet portait son poids de misère. On arrêtait des juifs, les traduisait devant les tribunaux sous l'accusation de sionisme-communisme et on les expédiait rapidement derrière les barreaux. Je scrutais les listes, craignant égoïstement de tomber sur le nom de mon frère, de mes cousins, de mes amis. Chaque envoi contenait son lot de drames, de mauvaises nouvelles et de cauchemars.

Quand les paquets tardèrent à venir, une lettre de Yéhouda me parvint de Téhéran où il s'était rendu clandestinement. Juste après Soukkoth, passant devant le café La Source, au boulevard Saint-Michel, où se retrouvaient les étudiants irakiens musulmans, l'un d'eux m'interpella et, sur un ton de sympathie et de commisération, me dit: "Je regrette pour ton frère". Livide, je demandai ce qui lui était arrivé. "Tu ne le sais pas? Il vient d'être condamné pour sionisme-communisme". Effondré, inerte, je n'arrivais plus à bouger. Et voici qu'un autre étudiant lui rétorqua, sans doute pour me calmer: "Je n'ai pas vu son nom moi. Tu dois te tromper". "Mais si, insistait l'autre, je dois encore avoir le journal". Ce n'est que plus tard que Yéhouda m'apprit qu'il avait soustrait du lot le journal portant l'horrible nouvelle.

Jusqu'au départ massif des juifs d'Irak pour Israël en 1951, y compris ma famille, ce jour de Roch Hachanah demeurera pour moi un jour de partage, de déchirement. D'une part, la naissance d'une année, d'une ère, d'un pays et d'autre part le commencement de la fin d'une communauté, la menace qui pesait sur son existence puis le départ forcé des descendants des exilés de Babylone, ceux-là mêmes qui avaient réussi à transformer leur exil en nouvelle naissance puisqu'ils ne s'étaient pas contentés de survivre mais avaient construit une communauté, rédigeant le Talmud, bâtissant une civilisation, le temps. Désormais, ils allaient poursuivre dans la terre d'où ils avaient été emmenés prisonniers, leur aventure séculaire et écrire, en Israël, une nouvelle page de leur histoire. Pour moi, Roch Hachanah annonçait et annonce toujours, comme pour tous les juifs, en même temps que la fin, la naissance du temps.

Romancier, essayiste et critique littéraire au journal Le Devoir, M. Naïm Kattan jouit d'une grande notoriété dans les milieux littéraires et culturels francophones du Québec et du Canada.

Naïm Kattan recalls Rosh Hashanah in Paris, where he had gone from Baghdad as a student in 1947. He speaks of his welcome in the Ashkenazi community and his fears for his family, who were facing anti-Jewish government policies in Iraq.

A not-so temporary stop in Sweden

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

By Rosh Hashanah 1948, I was supposed to be in the newly established State of Israel. For, as soon as we returned to our native Poland in 1946 from the Soviet Union, where we spent the years of World War II, my parents sent me to a hachsharah (training) kibbutz to prepare for life in Eretz Yisrael. But a couple of months before Israel was born, an opportunity arose to go to Sweden.

So, only weeks after my bar mitzvah, my parents and I left for the country then considered to be next-door to paradise. We insisted that it was to be a temporary sojourn, for we were staunch Zionists, weary of living as part of a hounded minority and determined to settle in the land of our ancestors. Our aim was, in the words of the song I was taught in the kibbutz, "livnot ulehibanot bah", (to build the land and be built-up by it).

It didn't work out that way. We opted for being built up in Sweden instead – as a transition only, of course. Half a century later, my mother still lives there.

Among our first Swedish acquisitions was a short-wave radio. As we didn't know the language of the country, we had to catch the news in other tongues. The BBC World Service was our window to the world. It brought the latest information about the establishment of the Jewish state and the attack by its enemies. Those who understood what was going on listened with long faces.

Jews in Gothenburg, the Swedish town where we settled, organized a meeting to mark the proclamation of Israel. As I knew Hebrew, I was asked to recite suitable poetry. I recall declaiming El Hatzippor (To the Bird), the youthful poem by Chaim Nachman Bialik. As intended, his words evoked yearning and hope in the audience: "Do you bring greetings from my brothers in Zion, my brothers both distant and near?" I could only feel the distance.

Those attending were mostly new immigrants like ourselves. Many were concentration camp survivors, rescued by the Swedish Red Cross in the closing days of the war. The established members of the Jewish community tolerated us.

Sweden stands in for Zion

some even patronized us, but we felt no warmth coming from them. We thought we identified with the poet who yearned for Zion, but, in reality, we wanted to feel at home in Sweden.

The confused feelings were reinforced by the experience of our first High Holy Days in the new country. All the seats in the main, very beautiful, synagogue in Gothenburg were reserved for old-timers. Only the last row and a few extra chairs at the back were available to us.

The German-style liberal service was strange and the language of the sermon incomprehensible. We felt the seemingly unbridgeable distance both from Zion and from our fellow Jews.

So, on the second day, we sought out the alternative, Polish-style service. As it was held in a small room, most of us had to stand outside. The grown-ups talked; I listened.

The major topic of conversation was the assassination, a few days earlier, of the UN mediator in the Middle East, Count Folke Bernadotte. He had been in charge of the Swedish Red Cross at the time of the rescue operation which, in April 1945, brought a few thousand women out of Nazi concentration camps to Sweden. Now the hero had been murdered – by a Jew! His UN mission may have been muddled and misguided, but did he really deserve this?

The matter concerned me personally, because at school I was made to feel responsible for what had happened. I had neither the knowledge nor the language to defend myself. But I understood enough to realize that, in the minds of many of my peers and some of my teachers, the crucifixion 1900 years earlier and the assassination of Bernadotte were of the same ilk. And the Jews were being blamed for both.

I had, therefore, reason to listen carefully to what the grown-ups were saying that Rosh Hashanah. Their arguments went along the line of, "If our people did it, they must have known what they were doing."

And then the rationalizations: Didn't the Swedish king, Gustav V himself – to whose family Count Folke belonged – show pro-German sympathies during the war? And wasn't the king's grandson, married to a German princess, in favor of Nazism? Perhaps the Red Cross action was a hypocritical cover-up for anti-Semitism? Sober analysis did not come naturally.

Of course, I couldn't repeat any of it at school. My task there was to conform and get on, for I realized that the only way out of my marginality was to learn the language and nod in agreement. Defending my people was not on my agenda.

The yearning for Zion receded. I had neither the background nor the maturity to cope with the tension between commitment to my people and the desire to become part of the new world opening up before me.

It took years before I found my way back, first to Jewish practice and then to Zionist commitment. Only when I had gained sufficient distance from the world that turned Sweden into a haven could I return to the path that led to the Land of Israel.

Fifty years later, I get "the best seat in the house" on Rosh Hashanah. One of my aims is to help Jews to strengthen their commitment to their Jewish heritage, the Land of Israel and the country in which they are rooted. Another is to make our congregation hospitable to newcomers.

But the experience of that first Rosh Hashanah in Sweden has never faded from my memory. It may also have colored much of what I have been saying and doing ever since.

The joyous moment was spent in jail

By SASSON MAYER

My last Rosh Hashanah in Iraq is still unforgettable in my memory. I spent it in jail in Basra.

For more than 2,000 years, Jews kept dreaming, praying and hoping for the day when Jews would no longer be avadim (slaves) in foreign lands: "Next year in Jerusalem."

That day finally came in May 1948 after a long wait, and when I remember that precious and historical day and recount the cataclysmic chain of events that followed, I begin wondering if it was the fulfilment of a dream or the result of long hard work and planning.

That day in Baghdad, while some Jews were glued to the radio, turned to its lowest volume, listening to David Ben-Gurion proclaiming the establishment of the State of Israel, the rest were carrying out their daily routine with great anxiety and fear.

The night before, rumors had circulated about a possible mob attack on the Jews. The Jewish underground movement that had been formed in Baghdad in 1941 now took precautionary measures. The well-trained shoora boys were stationed in defensive positions, supplied with hand grenades, molotov cocktails and handguns. Few as their supplies were, they were determined that "never again" would Jews give in without a fight.

The underground told the chief rabbi, as head of the community, about their precautionary measures. They explained that any attack would end in bloodshed. The rabbi, in turn, passed the message on to the minister of the interior and the chief of police.

The government of Iraq, concerned that things might get out of hand while its army was marching on Palestine, declared martial law and forbade all gatherings. The immediate danger passed, but the catastrophe was yet to come.

The Iraqi army was quickly defeated by the army of the young Jewish state. This ultimately brought to the surface the devious intentions of the Iraqi government with regard to the Jews. Jewish government employees were fired, import and export licenses were denied to Jews and prominent people and some community leaders were brought in front of military courts all over the country and charged with all kinds of ridiculous and fabricated crimes.

Heavy fines and jail terms were levied, and other actions were taken to devitalize the Iraqi Jewish community, the oldest outside Israel, dating back more than 2,500 years to the destruction of the Temple and the Jews' exile by Nebuchadnezzar.

After the destruction of the Temple, Jews sat in Babylon weeping for their loss, but after a while, they followed the advice of their prophet to settle. They worked and flourished. They learned and studied. They built synagogues and became the centre of Jewish learning and knowledge, with several famous academies. One of their most magnificent contributions to Judaism was the Talmud.

But they never forgot Jerusalem and Eretz Yisrael. They kept communicating, travelling and sending all kinds of help, donations and shlichim to synagogues and yeshivot. Eretz hakodesh tzedakah boxes were found in all synagogues as well as many Jewish business places.

For many years, the connection to Eretz Yisrael was strictly religious and historical, but that changed after the first Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897, when a more nationalistic Zionism began to take root among Iraqi Jews. The first "Zionist organization" in Iraq was established in 1920 by six organizers, of whom my father was one. The organization received the official approval of the British viceroy in Baghdad.

Jews continued emigrating to Palestine, despite British restrictions. After the bloody pogroms of 1941, Zionism began influencing the thinking of the entire Jewish community, the young in particular.

Self-defence training began, modern Hebrew lessons were introduced, weapons were accumulated, messengers came and went from Israel, and wireless communication was established with Eretz Yisrael.

The underground's activities were governed by strict secrecy and its existence was never revealed, even though many members had been arrested, tortured and imprisoned. Despite the secrecy, the prime minister in Baghdad once said in Parliament he was sure Israel had spies in Iraq.

In 1949, a young boy who was a former member of the undergound was arrested. Under pressure, or perhaps enticement, he became an informer and led police to colleagues and friends involved in the Zionist cause. This caused a serious crisis in the Jewish community: many members of the underground went into hiding, and orders were given to suspend all activity.

However, 200 boys and 70 girls were arrested in the late hours one night shortly thereafter. Parents heard nothing about the whereabouts of their sons and daughters. They turned to the chief rabbi, as head of the community, for answers, but he showed no sympathy and offered no help. After demonstrations and heated debate, the rabbi was forced to resign.

Most Iraqi Jews relocated to Israel

The new leader, who was not a rabbi, was a prominent personality with extensive connections in the government. He walked a tightrope, as his actions were scrutinized by both the community and the government. He secretly cooperated with, and recognized the de facto influence of, the underground movement headed by Israeli shaliach Mordechai Ben Porat. Some calm followed, and the arrests and raids stopped for awhile.

Although sympathetic to the Arab Palestinian cause, the majority of the Iraqi population was apathetic regarding the government's actions against the Jews. Jews and non-Jews had continued working together – it was business as usual – and no violence or incidents were reported.

But as the situation with the government became more desperate, the majority of the community, and especially the young, lost hope and began fleeing to neighboring Iran. Hundreds left every week. Many were caught and thrown in prison. Entire families began selling their houses to pay smugglers for their freedom.

While the contumelious treatment of the Jews continued, conflicting rumors abounded. Finally, the government issued a law allowing Jews to renounce their Iraqi citizenship and go to Israel. However, this was followed a year later by a decree freezing and confiscating the assets of Jews who applied to leave Iraq as well as those living abroad. Suddenly, everything Jews owned was plundered, and they became desperate.

A few days before my last Rosh Hashanah in Iraq, six of us – including Ben Porat – were captured. We spent two weeks in prison, hiding our true names and identities, and then we were released on bail and returned to Baghdad. A few months later, 10 days after I left for Israel, the few remaining underground members, including Ben Porat, were arrested.

After cruel and lengthy torture, Ben Porat was released on bail and fled to Israel. Two of the other arrested underground members were not so fortunate. They were tried and sentenced to death by hanging. One of them was Joseph Basri, my best friend and superior. When he went to be hanged, he shouted: "Long live the State of Israel."

So the end came to a once influential and prosperous community of 200,000 Jews. Most went to Israel, with the rest scattering all over the world, including 1,500 families who today live in Canada. Only about 350 Jews remain in Baghdad.

Sasson Mayer, who is retired, was a member of the Zionist underground in Iraq and now lives in Toronto.

Rebirth and renewal in a new St. Paul pulpit

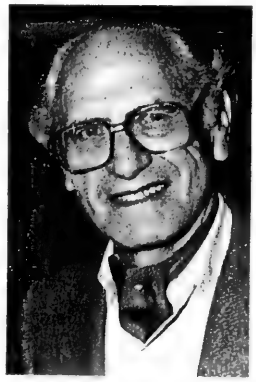
By RABBI GUNTHER PLAUT

The fall of 1948 was the time when I moved to St. Paul, Minn. My previous pulpit had been in Chicago, and now my family and I made the trek to what appeared to us as a far away state, located somewhere in the northwestern region of the country. I had been in Minneapolis very briefly some years before, on a Zionist mission, but never came to know St. Paul until we settled there.

I still remember the problems I had with my Rosh Hashanah sermon. It was my first appearance before the whole congregation – the oldest in Minnesota, tracing its roots to the middle of the previous century.

There was no question in my mind that my first sermon had to deal with the rebirth of the Jewish state, after the long hiatus when our people had wandered from land to land and half of them had finally perished in the Holocaust. I briefly wondered whether it was wise to start my ministry with a message on history and politics rather than a purely spiritual subject, especially since my new congregation – so I was told – had not been known as Zionist.

I had faced the same dilemma once before, in my first pulpit in Chicago. I was still a student and had made application to the Washington Boulevard Temple. While working on my sermon, I received the telephone call from the vice-president of the congregation. In essence he said that whatever I was planning to talk about, I should avoid mentioning the subject of Palestine (this was in 1939). Even though I had no experience in American congregational life, I felt that I had to resist this unwarranted advice and plunged ahead, preparing a lecture on the future of Jewish settlement in the Promised Land. Somewhat to my surprise, I did get the job.



Now, nine years later, I decided on the same solution. St. Paulites might be cool to the new Jewish State, but the members might as well learn right from the start that they had a Zionist as their new spiritual leader.

The state had a small population and its harsh climate during the winter kept it isolated from many of the nation's concerns. Until Hubert Humphrey became the mayor of Minneapolis, that city had been described by an American sociologist as "the capital of American anti-Semitism." But this was changing. Humphrey had made a difference and had become a senator, destined to have a huge influence on the Democratic party — along with his associates Eugene McCarthy and Walter Mondale. For some 15 years, that small and remote state became the hub of American Democratic politics – it was an exciting time, and it was my good fortune to have the major players as good friends.

But the existence of Israel had not yet penetrated the consciousness of Jew or gentile. In the fall of 1948, the Berlin Airlift and possible war with Russia were the big news, not little Israel. During the early '50s, I was probably one of the very few who had ever been to Jerusalem, and even the Holocaust had not as yet become a memorable presence. In time, the Zionist impulse came not from St. Paul, but from Minneapolis, with its splendid Talmud Torah and a cadre of old-time Zionists.

For the last few years it had been the custom of my new congregation to hold its High Holy Days services at the downtown Civic Auditorium – the synagogue being too small to hold the growing membership. But when we arrived at the spacious edifice downtown, we noted that people had assembled outside rather than inside. A serious hitch had developed. The night before, the redoubtable Roy Rogers had given a performance on the stage of the auditorium and of course, had done it on the back of his famous horse, Trigger. Whether it was the heat wave Minnesota was experiencing or the unfamiliar surroundings of the auditorium, or perhaps it was an intestinal upset – in any case, the horse had relieved himself at the very end of the performance and the damage was not discovered until the next morning when the crew came in to prepare the place for our Rosh Hashanah service. Unfortunately, while the Torah speaks on various occasions of a re'ach ha-nicho'ach, the "sweet smell" of a sacrifice, what Trigger had left behind could not be so described.

Eventually, the hall was deemed fit for our occupation, but the memory, preserved by our olfactory senses, lingered. It was an inauspicious start for my rabbinate. But all went well that night, despite everything.

I reminded the congregation that once upon a time an Egyptian inscription preserved the judgment of a Pharaoh concerning the fate of the Jewish people. "They are no more," was its sense, "the Jews have been erased from history."

But we have come back, I said. Though we have suffered grievously, we are still alive, and now the establishment of a Jewish state proclaims it to the world. That was the essence of my message and I still remember how I concluded it with a quotation from William Henly:

"It matters not how strait the gate,/ How fraught with punishment scroll,/ I am the master of my fate,/ I am the captain of my soul."

All that happened 50 years ago, and not many are left to remember the night when Roy Rogers had preceded our Rosh Hashanah service. For me, Jews had indeed become masters of their fate once again, and I was happy that my new congregation embraced the message. Perhaps they had been waiting for it.

New year a blur of activity

By RABBI ERWIN SCHILD

Why can I not recall Rosh Hashanah 5709 with any degree of precision? What could have been more momentous and memorable than the day that would usher in the first complete year of a sovereign Jewish state since Rome reduced Judea to a vassal state in 64 BCE?

I can recall the feverish emotions of the preceding months: the ecstasy, the fear, the doubts, the despair, the elation, the glory and the sorrow. But the details are blurry, like a newsreel run at triple speed.

There are reasons. I had just completed my first year as rabbi of the Roumanishe Shul Adath Israel. Twenty-eight years old, I was weighed down by the burdens of a congregation, awed by the anticipation of preaching to a packed synagogue, and overwhelmed by what I considered to be my heavenly ordained mission to call back my flock to Jewish responsibility. I was still teaching 15 hours a week at the Yeshiva Torah Chaim. I was working on my MA at the University of Toronto, in the Near Eastern department, where the rise of a Jewish State, its viability and its right to exist were hotly disputed topics. I had responsibilities as a husband and as the father of two little children.

The euphoria I had experienced on Pesach did not last. As we sat down to the seder, we knew a Jewish state was about to be proclaimed. Its name was still a secret or had not yet been decided. The United Nations had voted for the partition of Palestine. The Yishuv had accepted reluctantly the offer of sovereignty over a truncated homeland. At the seder, it was exhilarating to feel that we were truly reliving the original exodus, waiting for the signal of liberation. The hour struck. Contrary to the well-meant advice of friendly governments who advocated deferral and patience, the provisional government declared the independence of Israel.

The ensuing months had been hectic. Fear rose in our throats. The Arab world had embarked on the destruction of the fledgling state. The outlook was dim.

The Talmud reports a journey to Rome undertaken by Rabbi Eliezer, Joshua and Gamliel to plead the

Defying the odds, Israel would live

Jewish cause at the Imperial Court, then at the height of its power. A sneering official told them not to bother: "In 30 days, there will be no Jew left in the world!" A similar boast by Arab leaders hung over Israel. The spectre of the Shoah rose again.

Our community reacted. Jews in Toronto, and hopefully the world over, would not let the young state down. We raised money. Volunteers left to fight with the newly created defence force of Israel. Weapons of war, arms and ammunition, artillery, tanks and airplanes were desperately needed. I remember a congregant of ours who worked for Levy Auto Parts telling us how the firm, headed by prominent community leaders, tried to help the Jewish defence forces. Day and night, arms for Israel were secretly assembled at the plant and shipped.

Each day we scanned the newspapers and listened to the radio to keep abreast of the rapidly unfolding events. There were victories and defeats, and heavy sacrifices. Our friend, Joseph Levin, who had come to Canada via the same route as I, namely as an interned enemy alien, had gone to Israel to join the struggle for the creation and the defence of the Jewish state. We heard sad news: he fell in battle — a hero's death.

Only a desperate people would absorb such casualties which eventually amounted to one percent of the Jewish population. But Israel had stood firm. Contrary to the predictions of doom, contrary to the odds projected by an anticipated imbalance of power and numbers, the Jewish forces seemed to prevail. Each day brought new hope. By the time Rosh Hashanah was upon us, we knew that while the struggle was not yet over, while many more exertions and sacrifices were required, the challenge would be met. Israel would live. It was a new era, not a new year, that we were about to greet.

However, we were not doing so well on the home front. It was more than a problem: it was a scandal. The Jewish community seemed to be turning its back on the Holocaust survivors. For several years, we had pleaded with the government to relax immigration restriction so as to make the immigration of the so-called displaced persons possible. At long last, the authorities had yielded. Holocaust survivors were being admitted in greater numbers. At Rosh Hashanah time, hundreds were expected in Toronto.

Housing was exceedingly scarce. The move to the suburbs, which would change the Jewish demography, was only just beginning. Canadian Jewish Congress appealed to the members of the community to open their homes and to make accommodations available. Immigrants were basically on their own, really dependent on the willingness of the Jewish community to help them find affordable rental housing or at least temporary hospitality in spare rooms of Jewish homes. To our embarrassment, it appeared the community did not rise to the challenge. Incidents of discrimination were reported: some Jewish landlords refused to rent to DPs. Families with children had an especially hard time finding accommodations.

In my sermon on Kol Nidre night, I appealed to my congregants to open hearts and homes to newcomers. I appealed to their Jewish solidarity and to their sense of shame: these "displaced" Jews survived death camps, hid in the forest and endured cold and starvation; what will they think of us, Jews living in a land of plenty in spacious homes but unwilling to share with those who bore our affliction and suffered the Jewish fate for us? I held out Israel as an example: the embattled state had opened its doors to a flood of new immigrants.

Too bad one has to be old to remember Rosh Hashanah 5709! What a privilege, though, to have lived when Israel was born! And to talk about it, 50 years later.

Rabbi Erwin Schild is rabbi emeritus at Adath Israel Synagogue in Toronto.

Tradition

Paul Stern, President

I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur snuggled up to my Saba. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music . . .

And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing . . .

And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.

After all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitement. Now I celebrate these times with my family and I know these traditions will carry on.

It was a special personal time

By BERNARD J. SHAPIRO

I cannot even pretend to remember the details of my or my family's celebration of Rosh Hashanah after Israel came into existence. I can only assume that, in my mother's home, the somehow magical aromas of honey cake and raisin-filled challahs mingled with the more usual sounds and smells of preparations for a regular shabbos to signal that something special was at hand.

It was, of course, not only the food. New clothes were bought, our tallaisim were washed and pressed; my brother and I speculated, yet again, on how long the synagogue sexton would be able to sustain the grand final blast of the shofar; and we all promised ourselves that we would be "better" in the coming year than we had been in the one just ending.

Although I am sure that Israel was very much on our minds as well as in both our hearts and our conversations, Rosh Hashanah 1948-49 remains in my memory not connected with Israel so much as with an occasion in my own life – my bar-mitzvah. This special event in my life, and in that of my twin brother Harold, had taken place some months earlier on Shavuot. Rosh Hashanah 1948-49 was for me, therefore, not so much Israel's first Rosh Hashanah as an independent state as it was my first Rosh Hashanah as an independent adult – at least religiously speaking.

This "growing up" was supposed to be a great opportunity, a time when I would in some unspecified and certainly unarticulated way "step out" of my parents' shadow into a spotlight of my own. This was not my experience, for at home nothing had, in fact, changed. I continued to be "sent" to school, "sent" to Hebrew school, "sent" to piano lessons, "sent" on messages, "sent" to visit relatives, and "sent" to collect for the Combined Jewish Appeal and the Jewish National Fund. I do not want to suggest that all of this was some kind of burden

NOT A BURDEN, JUST PRECIOUS

Bar mitzvah associated with Israel's birth

– some of it was, and some of it was not. In all cases, however, there was no consideration of personal choice.

Of what avail, therefore, was it to be bar mitzvah? In what way could I break out – however slightly – from the established routines? I certainly could not decide to abandon the synagogue, to drop out of Hebrew school, or to give up the piano. There were unwritten but not for that reason less strenuously enforced rules and standards about all of that in our family. Was the imagined freedom of post-bar mitzvah to be entirely illusory?

No – at least not during Rosh Hashanah 1948-49. I decided that what I could do, was raise my own standards beyond that of the family circle. I would walk the several miles to shul and back - forcing not only a grudging admiration but, perhaps more importantly, a delay in the midday meal. I would arrive at shul before services actually started thus accentuating or, at least, drawing attention to (in my own mind) the arrival of my parents some time later. I would "daven" harder if not more sincerely.

Fatuously, I admired myself! No one else seemed wildly impressed. After all, they knew better – they knew just how long I would be able to sustain the new "me". I, however, was delighted – not to say smug. I had shown to myself that there were opportunities for choice, and where there are opportunities for choice there are chances for renewal – the real promise of Rosh Hashanah.

In retrospect, I recognize how self-absorbed I was and must have seemed to those around me. My parents, however, "understood," and they nodded knowingly to each other, confident that I would eventually understand that developments in what had finally become Israel were more important – both to me and to all Jews – than developments in my own life. I am sure that they were right, and although only Winston Churchill had the nerve to identify – at least rhetorically – events in his own life with movements in world history, I continue to associate my bar-mitzvah with the founding of the State of Israel. In some sense, the State and I share a birth year. The State will always be the number of years old that I am post-bar mitzvah!

A family legacy continues its journey

By ZIPPORAH DUNSKY SHNAY

A letter to my grandson, Jacob, born 11 Adar 5758-March 9, 1998:

I would like to share with you some memories of my early experiences celebrating Rosh Hashanah. You are the fifth generation of my family in Canada, yet your roots are deeply embedded in centuries of Jewish tradition.

My zayde, Chatzkell Stillman, came to Montreal in the early 1920s, a few years later than my mother Esther. Their stories of "stealing the borders" are full of courage and determination and horror, but that must be left for another time.

My mother and my father, Shimshon Dunsky, were idealists, Zionists and secular Jews. We spoke Hebrew at home in anticipation of making aliyah to Israel where my parents owned land. The use of Hebrew also reflected their firm conviction that language, history, literature and cultural traditions expressed the essence of Judaism rather than ritual observances and adherence to strict interpretations of Halachah.

And this legacy was what I came to regard in adult life as one of the many contradictions or paradoxes which nevertheless had a positive influence on me.

In Folks Shule this secular orientation was both broadened and deepened. We studied Tanach, which was our history and our culture, ours to know and explore, for that is what shaped us and gave us form, substance and a philosophy of life.

We learned about the Jewish life cycle and the importance and beauty of the holidays. To this day, I have an abiding love for the holidays and their traditions.

We celebrated Rosh Hashanah with pomp and respect. A holiday mood prevailed. Guests shared our table, festively set with flowers, wine, crystal and china, and traditional foods, specially prepared, were served. We exchanged visits with other members of the extended family – aunts, uncles, cousins. My great-aunt Bassie's home figures largely in this tableau, as does the exchange of yom tov greetings as we walked up and down Park Avenue, the major artery of our predominantly Jewish neighborhood.

Rosh Hashanah was one of the few holidays on which we attended shul. My father, my brother and I went, but my mother rarely joined us. I suspect that the reason my father went to shul on Yom Kippur, was to honor his father-in-law, my Zayde Chatzkell.

Chatzkell was the gabbai of the shul which stood at the corner of Colonial and Duluth. It had in a previous incarnation been a stable for horses, and still had an earthen floor in the entry. Once inside the entrance, the first door on the left led to the men's section, the second door to the women's. My zayde sat by the mizrach vant (eastern wall) and a seat was reserved beside him for my father. I don't recall where my brother sat. He probably didn't sit at all but ran around with cousins, as I did after visiting with my great aunt, other aunts and their friends in the vaiberishe shul (women's section). Their warmth, the delight with which they greeted me, and the ambiance of the shul remain with me to this day.

As do the arguments that raged every year during the United Jewish Appeal drive in the shul. I could not now describe the specifics.The arguments and quarrels were only peripherally related to the appeal itself. They more accurately reflected old feuds and grudges that were generational and seasonal.

It was pure theatre. This annual spectacle was played out against a backdrop of old animosities and shifting alliances, feuds that must have originated in the shtetl. Many of the shul members were landsleit, people who came from the same or neighboring shtetlach. Some were communists, and saw no contradiction in this anti-religious, revolutionary ideology and attending shul on Rosh Hashanah (or any other holiday). Zionists, Communists, and people of every stripe of Orthodoxy argued, yelled and prayed together.

PEACE

Shtetl spirit in Montreal

Did they bring this culture – this argumentative spirit – from the shtetl and transplant it to Montreal? The tensions and the energies which were so abundant in my zayde's shul – are they not the same as those that characterize and define Israeli politics today? The volatile mix of politics and religion, secular life and Orthodoxy, have long been characteristics of Jewish life, and have largely contributed to a creative and dynamic society. Jewish life is full of hope and diversity, a tapestry, rich in texture, color and content.

Much to rejoice

As Israel celebrates its 50th anniversary, there is much to rejoice in, and much to worry about. Will the peace process provide permanent solutions to what seem to be intractable problems? When I reflect on internal divisions that increase in intensity as the quality of public debate diminishes, my zayde's shul comes to mind, with all its politics, internal divisions and majestic angers. And I know that this debate is an integral part of the fabric of who we are as a people and how our history has played out, and will no doubt continue to exist in the future.

I bequeath this richness to you Jacob, a Judaism that is dynamic, full of hope and realism, diversity and constancy. I pass it on to you as it was passed on to me, this chain of continuity. There will be many milestones along your road as you find your own path. Acquire the knowledge, the tools and vocabulary to fulfil yourself within this Jewish framework.

May you enjoy your memories of all the Rosh Hashanahs to come in your life, as I did (and do) in mine.

Zipporah Dunsky Shnay is the executive director of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal.

A final goodbye to my lost world

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

It was in the beginning of September 1948 when I received my renewed foreign passport and entry visa to France.

After spending close to two years in the half-ruined city of Wroclaw, in Lower Silesia – it was acquired by Poland after the war – I decided to leave Poland. The hopes of rebuilding the destroyed Jewish community – even in a miniscule form – by establishing a number of compact and productive Jewish settlements in the former German territories, had dimmed and faded.

The ruling Polish Workers' Party – the name the communists gave themselves – was relentless in its drive to liquidate or swallow all its rivals and allies alike. Just like in the Soviet Union, the remaining Bundists would soon be forced to join the ranks of the "United" Workers' Party, the Zionists would be outlawed and the religious barely tolerated.

Many of my friends and colleagues began to leave Poland illegally, heading for the DP camps in the American or English zones of Germany. As I was with my wife and our 3-year-old daughter, I was not eager to participate in the adventure of stealing across the border of Czechoslovakia into Germany. Luckily, our passports were renewed and we were provided with refugee visas for France. By the end of October we would be leaving Poland, the land of our childhood and youth, and of our great calamity.

It was a week before Rosh Hashanah, and suddenly I was overcome by an urge to see for one last time my hometown, Otwock, 28 km south of Warsaw. I had visited the town several times before, right after our repatriation from the Soviet Union. I thought then that I had seen enough of the abandonment and destruction of my home and people. But now, before leaving the country forever, I could not help my reaction. I had to say goodbye to the ruins of my lost world.

There was no time to lose. I boarded an overnight train to Warsaw and there, in the morning, I took the fast electric train to Otwock. I arrived at midday at the familiar Otwock train station. Before the war, a long row of droshky, their drivers mostly Jewish, waited on the square in front of the station, ready to take travellers to the different hotels (called pensionaty) of the resort city.

Now the square was nearly empty, with only two or three droshky and a single taxicab waiting in rain for passengers. I passed them silently and turned to the road leading to the former Jewish area below the railway tracks and the central bazaar.

Here behind the railway ramp, 8,000 Otwock Jews were gathered on Aug. 19, 1942, and dispatched in cattle cars to the death camp of Treblinka. Right there, at the corner of Yoselewicza Street, still stood the apartment building where I spent my childhood and youth.

I had left my home at the age of 18, in the first week of September 1939, never again to see my parents, my little brother and three younger sisters who had remained behind. By mid-September I arrived with two friends in the city of Lutzk, in eastern Poland, which was soon occupied by the Red Army. After a few months I registered for work in central Russia, and later on, after the Germans attacked the Soviet Union, I moved to Uzbekistan and Kirgizia, in the southern regions of the country, where I lived until my repatriation to Poland in 1946.

Jewish district in ruins

In Otwock, I approached the house where I had lived – a long, two-storey brick building formerly occupied by close to 20 Jewish families. In the front were the stores or shops; behind and on the upper floor, the living quarters. A vaulted gate led into the spacious courtyard that teemed with lively, noisy children in the summertime. I entered the yard and was stricken by the surrounding emptiness and silence. A few of the dwellings were somehow renovated and occupied, the rest were empty, with broken or nailed boards on the windows and doors.

I continued further on Yoselewicza Street and was again amazed at the unbelievable destruction. Most of the Jewish houses, among them some two- and three-storey structures, had been taken apart and cleared to the ground, leaving several open spaces, with grass already sprouting. I wondered why so many good houses levelled to the ground. People could at least have moved in and made use of them.

On a nearby side lane I approached the ruins of the Otwock mikvah, the ritual bath-house. Beside it stood a remnant of a small synagogue — Reindorf's Shul, it was called. The four walls of the shul were still intact, with recognizable outlines of the folk paintings on the walls — various biblical animals and a huge mythical leviathan in centre.

During the German occupation the building was used as a stable for horses. The other much larger synagogue of this Jewish quarter, on nearby Kupietzka Street, was used for worship until the ghetto was liquidated. It was then burned or taken apart together with all the houses on the street. I found the same silence and abandonment in the former courtyard of the Otwock chassidic rabbi, further on Yoselewicza Street, where I used to attend the High Holy Days services with my father

By nightfall, I was exhausted from inspecting on foot the ruins of the Jewish district. Here and there I encountered some Poles willing to talk. They were all from other parts of the city and had moved in recently. They could not provide any information on the people I had known and had cherished. Hurriedly I returned by train to my lodging in Warsaw, leaving the visit of the other part of the city for the next day.

Street marked by two beautiful shuls

The upper part of the city, above the railway tracks, was always considered rich and more prominent. The whole area here was covered with pine trees, divided into villas, pensionaty and several sanatoria for tuberculosis sufferers. On the prominent Warszawska and Reymonta streets were two large and beautiful synagogues built by Jewish philanthropists. Both synagogues were burned down by the Germans soon after their entry into town.

There, in separate villas, lived the renowned chassidic rabbis: the Rabbi of Modzic and the Kozhenitzer Rebbe. Not far from them was the Centos, a Jewish orphanage that was bombed on the first day of the war, and the Zofiowka hospital for the mentally ill. And there, in a wooded area behind Reymonta Street, was the large memorial stone on the mass graves of over 4,000 Jews murdered just after the main body of the Otwock community was sent to Treblinka.

These Jews were driven out of their basements and attics, where they had been hiding for some time. They were assembled in an open enclosure at the police station of the Judenrat until a detachment of German gendarmes arrived – usually twice a week – to execute them, men, women and children. They were led, 10 to a row, to the open pits and shot, layer upon layer, during the month of Elul, in the Jewish year of 5702 (1942).

I had seen enough, and my personal knowledge of what happened was supplemented by the gruesome stories of several survivors I had met. I returned to Warsaw the same day and was back in Wroclaw next morning.

Rosh Hashanah had come and I put on my holiday suit and walked towards the nearby Jewish centre, where several hundred Jews – survivors and returnees from the Soviet Union– had assembled for the New Year's service.

Our own fault

Many thoughts crowded my mind as I stood hesitantly at the threshold of the Wroclaw synagogue. Should I go in and pray and ask forgiveness from a God that allowed the wanton murder of millions of my people, most of them pure and blameless, pious and observant in all the precepts of the Torah? What kind of merciful Father and King is He that decreed such a fate to His servants? On the other hand, maybe we should blame ourselves for the lot that befell us? It was our own fault that we did not foresee or prevent the Holocaust.

Here I was, together with several hundred thousand other Jews, who fled at the outbreak of the war to the Soviet Union, and most of us survived and returned to Poland. Where were our leaders, religious and secular alike, who did not pay attention to Hitler's open threats of annihilation of the Jewish people? How could they be so blind not to see the writing on the wall after the Nuremberg laws, Kristallnacht, the Anschluss of Austria and parts of Czechoslovakia? An organized mass exodus to Russia, or Romania in the first months of the war, or even later, when the borders were still not entirely sealed, could have saved the main body of Polish Jewry. And myself, why did I abandon my parents and my siblings to save my own skin? Blame them, I thought, our leaders and ourselves and not God...

Through the open doors I heard the solemn, familiar tunes of the High Holy Day prayers and I recalled the days of my childhood when I stood in the Otwock synagogue beside my father, wrapped in his large tallit, reciting aloud the prayers and confessions from his machzor. And I saw the fully packed shul of the Otwock Rebbe lit by tall, dripping candles set in sand boxes. And I heard the cries and well wishes of the women, my mother and her neighbors, in our courtyard on Yoselewicza Street, on the eve of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Slowly I entered the Wroclaw Synagogue, to be together with my people, the remnant, to join them in their anguished memorial prayers and calls to Heaven.

Bombs, not the shofar, sounded in Jerusalem

By RABBI ABRAHAM SOFFER

We celebrated Rosh Hashanah 50 years ago on the same days, Monday and Tuesday, as we will this coming year. As a resident of besieged Jerusalem in 1948, I recall that there was not much of a celebration.

I remember my mother's anxiety about whether my father, who was an army officer, would join us for the "apple dipped in honey" on the eve of the holiday. Would he be able to take my younger sister, my brother and me to the synagogue the next day to listen to the sound of the shofar? Would we have enough food to fulfil the obligation necessary for the holiday? Would the elderly water carrier bring the two buckets of water allotted to each family before candlelighting?

Five months prior to that Rosh Hashanah, on the eve of Shabbat, the 5th of Iyar, David Ben-Gurion proclaimed and established the State of Israel. But the people of Jerusalem didn't hear the sound of the shofar on that Rosh Hashanah 50 years ago. They did hear the sound of bombs, shelling and gunfire. People died from the shellings by merely walking in the streets. In fact, an elderly friend of our family, who helped my mother by bringing in the allotted amount of water, was killed by a shell some weeks later on his way to our home, carrying these buckets.

The basic necessities of life did not exist. The bank notes, which we now call money, also did not exist. If you were fortunate and did not smoke, you would use the five cigarettes per week allotted to male adults for your "purchasing power." Half a cigarette bought one slice of bread.

monuments of the brave drivers, their defenders and the shelled trucks are visible on the road to Jerusalem to this very day.

I recall that my father, who was in charge of the army food supply to the Jerusalem units, took me for a visit to the front line.

At the Mandelbaum Gate, the Jewish positions were on one side of the street and the Jordanian legions on the other. There were approximately seven guns along a two-block position. The guns were fired through small "lookouts" in the wall by soldiers running from position to position in order to give the impression to the enemy that a large number of guns were present. Behind these gunners sat 50 to 60 soldiers banging heavy logs of wood onto empty barrels to create an unbearable sound. All of this was done to camouflage a terrible lack of ammunition. The Jordanians could have walked across the street, had they known what was taking place. Yet the Almighty had different plans for Jerusalem.

Rabbi Abraham Soffer is the educational director of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

'Purchasing power' lost

At the beginning of the siege, as a 10-year-old boy, I had a chicken coop in our backyard. The eggs the chickens produced were used by my mother to purchase the necessities of life, and on the eve of Yom Kippur that year, a shell struck the chicken coop and our "purchasing power" disappeared. We were left only with the five weekly cigarettes.

This was a time when we were not sure if we would survive. Tears rolled down people's faces when a few fortified trucks broke the siege from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. For every truck that entered the city, four others were destroyed. The

Vancouver Jews were a Zionistic bunch

By GERTRUDE ZACK

It is 9:30 a.m., Oct. 4, 1948 – 5709 on the Jewish calendar – and we have just left our home for Rosh Hashanah services at the synagogue.

On that day 50 years ago, my husband Sidney and I had been married for just over seven years. We had a daughter, Rosalind, who was 4 years old, and a son Richard (now Rafi), who had just celebrated his first birthday.

Vancouver in those days was still a very small city, the entire population being somewhere around 320,000, with the Jewish population having grown from 2,740 in 1941 to 3,500 in 1948. That year, the first of 48 refugee children had arrived from Europe.

Most of those newcomers, now grown with children of their own, still live here as active and involved citizens. I recall teaching one pretty, but frightened young girl to read and speak English. She had survived the Holocaust and was a willing student.

The refugees in 1948 were principally from Europe, mainly from Poland and Czechoslovakia. They had travelled across Russia, fleeing in sealed cars and then by ship across the Pacific, seeking refuge in Canada.

Also around that time, under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress, there was a rescue scheme called Operation Flying Dragon, which was composed of more than 200 Jews who had left Shanghai and Kobe for Vancouver, after fleeing from the Nazis.

At that time, Vancouver boasted one large synagogue, the Scharah Tzedeck, which was Orthodox. Those who preferred a Conservative service met at the Jewish Community Centre for a number of years, until the soon-to-be-called Beth Israel Synagogue was dedicated in 1948 and built in 1949. There were also two very small ultra-Orthodox synagogues and an evening Talmud Torah school, which I had attended for many years, going across the city by street car, four days a week after school and on Sunday morning.

My class had five boys and three girls, I think. The community had only recently, in the spring of 1948, built a new facility as a day school on Oak Street across from where the Beth Israel would be.

Our community was composed of Zionistic people with a vibrant Zionist organization, who together with the women of Hadassah (now Hadassah-WIZO), worked diligently to help the new state achieve its mandate and secure its borders.

In October, just five months after we had been glued to the radio when the State of Israel was proclaimed and endorsed by the United Nations, I could still recall the nervous excitement, the thrill, as each country was polled, and our disbelief as some voted yes where a no had been expected.

I was reminded of a very secret evening meeting that took place in the playroom of our home just months before, dealing with how we could raise money to purchase what was needed for the future Jewish state to survive. Extra funds were desperately needed for antibiotics and the other medications necessary for the injured.

While the debate was raging as to Who is a Jew? when the Law of Return was being discussed, the doctors in Vancouver were mobilizing as many resources as possible to collect and ship essential medications that were so desperately needed. They were also examining boys who wished to go to Israel to join the armed forces, some with and others without military experience.

As our Jewish leaders were dealing with the issue of "double citizenship," in Vancouver the Wingate Club met weekly to discuss and determine what measures could be taken to assist in any way possible. The UJA intensified its campaign and increased its requests for funds, as all were aware of the probable increase in immigration to Israel.

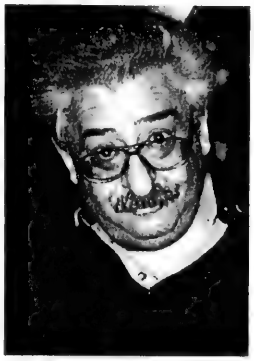
Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5759

Socialism and the shul

By LARRY ZOLF

Rosh Hashanah 50 years ago was my most memorable. It was my first Rosh Hashanah in a synagogue in Winnipeg. I was age 13 and well on my way to being a milestone in my father's life. The war had drastically changed my father. Zastavia, the Jewish village that my father had memorialized in his book, The Last of a Generation, had been wiped completely clean of Jews by the Nazis and the Polish bandits who assisted them.

The Holocaust was a tremendous shock to my father. He had expected heavy Jewish losses but not of this magnitude. He brooded about it constantly; he felt he had to make a response to it.



Before the war, my father was a conventional socialist Zionist, a fully paid up member in good standing of Mapam, the left labor Zionist party. My father's links to Mapam were ideological and personal. Mapam was the only Jewish party who made room for Yiddish in their scheme of things. My father was western Canada's most prominent Yiddish writer and this Mapam policy counted very heavily with him. The legendary Zarubel, the founder of Mapam, was from my father's village and was a close, close friend.

Rosh Hashanah in Vancouver

As I prepared to go to shul that October morning, I kept wondering in what way the service that day would be different: what would be said, how the sermon would relate to this momentous event, as today would be the first Rosh Hashanah service since the declaration of statehood. Would the sermon deal with the trials and tribulations of this new miracle? Would the general atmosphere feel different for those attending the service? After all, after so many thousands of years, there again would be a Jewish state. Would the rabbi talk about the Arab rejection of the United Nations proclamation, as the Arab countries continued their attacks on this new land? Would any of these issues be discussed? Surely this event would not or could not be ignored.

I was not to be disappointed. The members of the congregation gathered in groups. The atmosphere was electric with a sense of urgency, of purpose, of history being made. A Jewish state had been born and it had to survive and prosper.

Hatikvah

The rabbi began by making reference with fervor and reverence to the fact that a Jewish state, Israel, had finally come into being. He talked about what it would mean to the world, but more importantly, he posed the question of what it would mean to the Jews of the world. I cannot recall his exact words, but that day was like no other day.

I can still visualize the rabbi's presence on the bimah, as he called on all of his congregation to stand behind the needs of this new Israel, whatever they might be, financial or even physical.

But my most vivid recollection that morning was that as the service concluded, we, men, women and children, stood as one to recite "L'Shanah Haba'ah b'Yerushalayim," concluding with the singing of the Hatikvah loud and clear with tears flowing unashamedly. We hugged and kissed anyone and everyone as we filed out to return to our families.

The wonder of the fact that I have lived to see this come about was with me for a really long time. And now in 1998, although there is still no complete or total peace, Israel is already 50 years old, and it continues to flourish and grow.

Saving souls from the delusions of socialism

Before the war, my father's approach to life was purely socialist secular. My older brother Meyer did not get a bar mitzvah because bar mitzvahs, according to my father, were acts of superstition. Birthdays were not celebrated in the Zolf household because they were pagan contrivances. The laying on of phylacteries was considered barbarism and voodooism rolled into one. One attended synagogue only to bury relatives and friends.

These attitudes were officially endorsed by my father's Jewish socialist school, the Isaac Loeb Peretz Folk School. The school's Mothers' Union was always busy ferreting out religious superstitions that were being taught on the sly in the school.

My father, the socialist, of course could point to a life of Orthodoxy he had lived in Zastavia and which had been found very much wanting in the wake of the Nazi invasion and the slaughter of the innocents. Instead, my father had found his socialism comforting enough for most of World War II.

Things changed rapidly for my father when the British Labor party came to power in 1945. Until then my father could not believe a socialist could possibly hate Jews. Ernest Bevin, the all-powerful member of the British Labor cabinet, was both a socialist and a virulent anti-Semite.

The betrayal of the Jews by British socialists made my father begin to move ideologically and rapidly. Skull caps and prayer shawls were soon introduced to accompany the religious services held in the Zolf household every Friday night. My father disappeared on long walks with the Chassidim. My father secretly prayed at home, secretly prayed on the street, secretly prayed in the washroom of the Isaac Loeb Peretz Folk School.

My father had an agenda. My father was determined to save the Jewish boys and girls at his socialist school from the snare and delusion of socialism. In his classes, my father passed out lampoons and satires of socialism and asked the children to study them hard.

My father secretly introduced bar mitzvah training to the Peretz School. Now my father spent every spare second of every day with the Chassidim at the Beth Yakov Synagogue on Derby and Dufferin Streets, easily the worst slum area in Canada. Often my father and the Chassidim had to fight their way through gangs of Polish and Ukrainian toughs just to get into the Beth Yakov.

Of course, everything my father was doing on behalf of Orthodoxy was a firing offense at the school where he taught. The Peretz School, after all, was a socialist school and surely my father owed them some loyalty. But my father, on the other hand, saw only the socialist hordes depriving Jewish children of the sense of their Jewishness.

Not only did my father wish to save the souls of his pupils, he wished to save my soul too. My father enrolled me in the summer of 1945 in the rabbinical court of Rabbi Meyer Schwartzman, the Orthodox rabbi who made the salamis kosher for the Winnipeg branch of Chicago kosher salamis.

From then on, I would go to public school from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., have 4 to 5 off, attend my father's class in Yiddish literature from 5 to 7, then I was off to Orthodox immersion at the salami rabbi's place from 8 till midnight every day of the week. It was a gruelling, almost impossible schedule and I yearned to get free of it.

The high holy days approached. My father proudly presented me to the elders on the podium and they began to chant the prayers. I could not chant the prayers. I could not understand why they flipped the pages so often.

The elders, in turn, quite wrongly assumed I was a Jewish wunderkind, a wonder child. I don't know where they got that idea but maybe my father told them that. My father certainly told the elders I had memorized and delivered 100 pages of Bialik's The Slaughter City at only 6 years of age. I could therefore know the Rosh Hashanah service backwards and forwards, even after only one attempt.

But actually my father was having such a good time he forgot all about me. My father didn't see that I was suffering culture shock, that the bearded ones were scaring me half to death.

Then I was called up to read from the Torah all by myself. I could read Hebrew and understand a good deal of it, so my reading of the Torah portion was okay. But there were follow-up questions from the elders beside me on the podium. I tried to bluff my way through. I failed.

I fled the podium in tears. It was the worst afternoon of my young life. All I wanted to do was return to the bosom of socialism.

I told my father I did not want to be a rabbi and would like to be a socialist. My father humored me. I humored him back. I said I'd keep trying to be a rabbi. After all, it was Rosh Hashanah, a new year, a new challenge, a new blessing. My father was pleasant. My father was happy. Why shouldn't I be, was his philosophy.

I never did return to the Beth Yakov Synagogue. I finally fled the salami rabbi's emporium as well. My father's un-socialist activities at the school caught up to him and he was let go by the Peretz School.

Soon, very soon, I became a star scholar at the university and even the Peretz School socialists paid me tribute. My father felt avenged and was at last happy with me. But every Rosh Hashanah my father invited me to the Beth Yakov and cluck-clucked when I told him I had to study for exams.

I guess I never did get the taste of failure from my first Rosh Hashanah out of my mouth. The Beth Yakov had been built in Winnipeg in the 1880s and its characters seemed to date from that time. They were funny, pleasant men but to a 13-year-old their verbal shtick, their whispered aloud secrets, their relentless dialectics were scary, to say the least.

I'm not sure I could handle Rosh Hashanah services at the Beth Yakov today. All I'm sure is that I don't want to. One Rosh Hashanah at the Beth Yakov was enough for me.

Fifty luminaries of Israel

By GIL TROY

For the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem Scopus Award Tribute Dinner in Honor of J. Stephen Lipper last spring, I was asked to generate a list of 50 invisible guests of honor, luminaries who shaped Israeli/Jewish/Zionist thought. I offer this as one final tribute in the waning days of Israel's jubilee year.

This is one man's list – idiosyncratic and hardly systematic. I encourage people to take issue with me, for there were many worthy names which did not make the final cut. Even though 50 sounds like a lot, I filled the list pretty quickly (and ended up with 50 entries and 55 names).

The list is in no particular order, although I did group them into broad categories:

The Dreamers. Zionist thinkers who were insane enough to believe that their dreams could come true (and were largely right!)

The Architects. The men and women who helped establish the intellectual, social, cultural and political infrastructure of the Jewish homeland in Palestine, even before the official creation of the state.

The Founders. The heroes of the initial state-building effort.

The Shepherds. Leaders who have guided the state from a weak infant into the vibrant modern country it is today.

The Gurus. Thinkers, leaders, artists and popular figures who represent various aspects of the modern state.

Finally, I would note that at the end of the exercise, I was quite impressed – not with my efforts, but with the richness, the breadth, the depth of this small embattled country, which despite enduring so much trauma and tragedy has accomplished so much in so many realms.

The Dreamers

• Abraham, the first and simplest Zionist. God said "Lech Lecha MeArtzecha," leave the land of your birth and he did.

• Moses Hess, early Zionist, friend of Hegel, author of Rome and Jerusalem.

Theodor Herzl

• Theodore Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism. His personal odyssey from liberal, literate, assimilated journalist and playwright to Zionist visionary reminds us that Zionism was rooted in 19th-century intellectual movements and triggered by a deep disappointment with the failures of emancipation and enlightenment.

• Eliezer Ben Yehudah, the man most responsible for reviving the Hebrew language.

• Ahad Ha'am, a cultural Zionist, who anticipated a state which was not the place all Jews lived, but which had a central role in Jewish life.

•Ze'ev Jabotinsky, a Revisionist Zionist, who emphasized the need for Jewish self-defence, and for a Jewish nationalism.

•A.D. Gordon, a Labor Zionist, who "returned" to Palestine, worked the land and reflects the great pioneering love of Eretz Yisrael, the land of Israel.

• Henrietta Szold, founder of Hadassah, constructive force behind the all-important youth aliyah. She helped teach Diaspora Jews how to make critical and ongoing contributions to their old-new land, their newly-revived ancient homeland.

The Architects

• Berl Katznelson, great figure of the Second Aliyah, founder of the newspaper Davar, leader of the Histadrut labor movement. He inspired labor Zionists to focus on building the infrastructure of their soon-to-be state.

• Rav Avraham Kook, chief rabbi of Palestine in the 1920s and1930s. He showed that you could be a traditionalist and a Zionist, while also teaching his followers to tolerate the secularists.

• Hannah Senesh, poet, resistance fighter. Her poems reflect the Zionist love for the land. Her martyrdom as a resistance fighter behind Nazi lines, reflects the Zionist demand for heroic Jews ready to face any enemy.

• Chayim Nachman Bialik, poet. His poems praise the beauty of the traditional Sabbath, condemn the passive and pedantic galut victims of the Kishinev pogroms, and point the way to a vital and new tradition of Hebrew Literature in the new Jewish state.

Chayim Nachman Bialik

• Rachel Hamishoreret, poet. Her achingly beautiful hymns to the Kineret (the Sea of Galilee) evoke the intense love the chalutzim (pioneers) had for the land.

• Rabbi Judah Magnes, American-born Reform rabbi, chancellor and first president of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. He helped establish the intellectual infrastructure of the fledgling state, and was one of the most eloquent champions of a bi-national state where Arab and Jew could live in harmony.

• Prof. Martin Buber, brilliant, German-born, eclectic philosopher whose love of Haskalah (Enlightenment), and Chasidism led him to articulate a mystical yet rationally-based Jewish nationalism.

• Prof. Gershom Scholem, the quintessential Israeli academic, whose controversial reinterpretation of Kabbalah, Jewish mysticism, showed how central, even seemingly arcane, intellectual and historiographical issues could be to the modern Zionist enterprise.

• Natan Alterman, poet. He warned that no state will be given to the Jewish people on a silver platter, anticipating decades of great sacrifice.

• Saul Tchernechovsky, poet. He took the Zionist rebellion against tradition to its extreme, celebrating the "Canaanite" nature of the new Jew.

Saul Tchernechovsky

The Founders

• David Ben-Gurion, Israel's "George Washington" and "Thomas Jefferson." He was not only its first prime minister, but a key player in charting the state's ideological position on such difficult issues as the relations between Orthodox and secular Israelis, and the relations between Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

• Menachem Begin, first non-Labor prime minister, and eternal symbol of the anger and courage Zionism mined from European anti-Semitism. Begin was bold enough to bomb Iraq's atomic installation without the world's permission and bold enough to accept Anwar Sadat's challenge to risk trading land for peace.

• Moshe Dayan, Israel's superman. The one man most responsible for changing Israelis' (and Jews') image and self-image.

• Yigael Yadin, soldier, politician, and archaeologist. He uncovered the Jewish people's roots in modern Israel's soil.

• S. Y. Agnon, Israel's Shakespeare. His dense prose was rooted in layers of interpretation and thousands of years of rich Jewish learning. He won the Nobel Prize for Literature for works that symbolized the young country's search for intellectual and artistic legitimacy.

• Dr. Shimon Agranat, American-born president of Israel's Supreme Court. He capped a distinguished career as the young country's premier jurist by chairing the commission that explored the heart-breaking chain of mistakes that led to the surprise attack on Yom Kippur, 1973.

• Moshe Shamir, novelist, playwright. His 1948 novel and play, Hu Halach BaSadot (He Walked Through the Fields) described the new, strong, defiant and gruff sabra, and was part of an explosion of Israeli literature from the Palmach era that helped define the new country as a real place rather than an enduring dream.

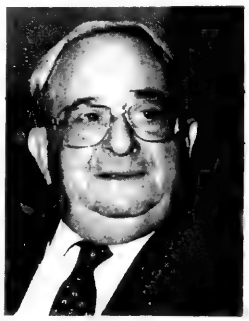
• Naomi Shemer, modern Israel's popular muse. Her songs capture the country's contradictory yearnings for normalcy and uniqueness, for the modern beauty of Tel Aviv, and the ancient power of Jerusalem the Golden, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav.

The Shepherds

• Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin, political leaders and Nobel laureates for peace. These bitter rivals functioned for decades as the yin and yang of the Israeli Labor party, and of the country itself. Peres, the Polish-born politician with European sensibilities, dreamed about a peace treaty which would make Israel the Switzerland of the Middle East. Rabin, the gruff sabra-soldier-turned peacemaker, rooted his dreams of peace in hard-edged strategic realities.

• Shulamit Aloni, civil rights activist, cabinet minister. She tried to translate the Zionist yearning for normalcy into policies by shoring up the state's secular identity and its commitment to human rights.

• Teddy Kollek, long-time mayor of Jerusalem. He shepherded the ancient city into the modern world while forging a model of Arab-Jewish cooperation in local, everyday matters.



Yitzhak Navon

• Yitzhak Navon, playwright and president. His tenure in office quietly but eloquently reminded Israelis of the rich and proud Sephardi tradition that shapes and enriches the modern state.

• Rav Moshe Levinger, founder of Gush Emunim. He synthesized the biblical and Zionist love of the land, turning thousands of religious Israelis into modern chalutzim in Judaea and Samaria.

• Rav Eliezer Shach, spiritual and political leader of the Haredim. He helped shape the modern state while rejecting the modern world.

Rav Shlomo Goren

• Rav Shlomo Goren, chief rabbi of the army, and Ashkenazi chief rabbi. His presence at the liberation of Jerusalem in 1967 linked the ancient with the modern, the religious Israeli with the secular Israeli.

Rav Ovadia Yosef

• Rav Ovadia Yosef, long-time Sephardi chief rabbi, and spiritual leader of Shas. This first-rate biblical commentator appeals to Sephardim who want the state to remain publicly traditional, regardless of what they do in their private lives.

• Tufik Tubi, Arab Communist, knesset member. He served in the Knesset for so long he became its senior member. He represents the conflicting impulses of the large Israeli Arab population. They enjoy far more democratic rights than their brethren in other Middle Eastern countries, yet lack complete acceptance in the State of Israel.

The Gurus

• Prof. Nechama Leibowitz and Prof. Yeshayahu Leibowitz, the brilliant brother-sister academic team. She was the Bible teacher and commentator extraordinaire who exposed generations of secular Israelis to the joys of Judaism's most venerable texts and its values. He was the iconoclast and dissident who harshly critiqued the emergence of the modern fortress state. He revealed the widespread crises of conscience provoked by Israel's military triumphs and tragedies.

• Natan Sharansky, politician, activist. The short, balding, modern-day Zionist hero today represents the great social, cultural, political, and intellectual potential of the new Russian aliyah.

Natan Sharansky

• Dan Ben Amotz, writer. This young writer's novels describe the new Sabra who is angrier, more materialistic, and more aimless, yet in many ways more secure than the first generation of Israelis.

Amos Oz

• Amos Oz, novelist and peace activist. He represents the continuing influence of kibbutz ideals, even as the kibbutz fades as a political, economic, and symbolic force.

• Ephraim Kishon and HaGashash HaCheever (Pauli, Gavri, Shaike), satirists and comedy trio. Together they were most responsible for teaching Israelis that all-important skill – how to laugh at themselves.

Ephraim Kishon

Prof. Benzion Netanyahu

• The Baba Sali, popular mystic. He ministers to thousands of Israelis who do not share the modern rationalists' disdain for the spiritual realm.

• Uri Zohar, popular entertainer. His emergence as a baal tshuvah inspired many other Israelis to reevaluate, and embrace traditional Judaism.

• Prof. Benzion Netanyahu, historian. His monumental analysis of the Spanish inquisition concluded that anti-Semitism is an enduring and central part of the Western tradition. This widespread belief, which is generally associated with Revisionist Zionists, has very powerful political implications for the contemporary state.

• Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, commentator and thinker. His work on the Talmud signifies Israel's role as a thriving centre of rabbinic thought.

• Azariah Alon, founder of Chevra L'Haganat HaTeva, the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. His weekly radio show made him a household name for two generations of Israelis who learned from him how to appreciate their natural environment

Rabbi David Hartman

• Rabbi David Hartman, thinker, oleh from Canada. His eloquent analyses of the central dilemmas of modern Israeli, Jewish, and Zionist thought do not solve all these issues, but certainly make it easier to think about them and discuss them.

• Prof. Naomi Chazan, academic and Knesset member. She represents a generation of professional Israeli women seeking to incorporate feminism into their lives.

• Prof. Anita Shapira, historian. A leading member of a new generation of historians, she is committed to revising standard Zionist myths and understanding the real facts behind the establishment of the State.

• Alice Shalvi, political activist. She is trying to reconcile Orthodoxy and feminism, with mixed results.

• Aviv Geffen, nihilistic rock star and enfant terrible. He represents the angry young Israeli wired into American values and popular culture.

Exploring the mysteries of techelet

By SARAH HERSHENSON
WZPS

A scuba diver holds a live murex trunculus snail, from whose gland the dye is taken for use in creating techelet.

God commanded the Children of Israel to use techelet, the royal blue color, on one strand of the white fringes worn on tzitzit (four-cornered garments) and prayer shawls. But between 570 and 750 CE, when royal edicts by conquering nations declared the wearing of tzitzit illegal, the secret of techelet's procurement and production was gradually lost. The Midrash Tanhuma, written in 750 CE, laments, "And now we have no techelet – only white." Although Jews continued to wear tzitzit through the centuries, the tradition of including the blue thread among the white fringes disappeared for 1,300 years.

A Jerusalem-based group established in 1980, Amutat P'til Techelet (the Association for the Promotion and Distribution of Techelet), claims to have solved the mystery of techelet and is producing the colored thread needed to fulfil the long-lost commandment.

Since the product gained the approval of several prominent rabbis in Israel, including the chief rabbi of Rehovot, Rabbi Simcha Kook, orders are pouring in from customers all over the world, at a rate of 300 per month.

The Talmud records that techelet comes from a snail, hilazon in Hebrew, whose home was said to be along the northern coastline of Israel, in the part of the country apportioned to the seafaring tribe of Zevulun. According to the Talmud, the tribe of Zevulun complained that their portion was hilly and unsuitable for agriculture, but God reassured them that everyone will come to them to buy the hilazon and blue techelet.

The search by Jewish scholars for the source of the true techelet was revived over 100 years ago. Archeologists, chemists, marine biologists, a great chassidic rabbi, the former chief rabbi of Israel, and some of the greatest rabbinical minds of our day have been involved in this quest.

The impetus for the rediscovery of techelet came in the late 1800s from Rabbi Gershon Hanokh Leiner, the chassidic rabbi of Radzyn. In addition to being a great scholar and the leader of a large chassidic community in Poland, Rabbi Leiner was a world traveller and a polylinguist with a penchant for medicine and chemistry. He believed that because it is a biblical commandment to wear techelet, it was his duty to find it. He concluded that the hilazon was not a snail at all but a cuttlefish belonging to the squid family. With a method discovered 200 years previously by a Parisian chemist, Rabbi Leiner turned the black ink powder this creature emits into a blue dye. Within a few years, all of his chassidim were wearing the blue thread in their tzitzit and continue to do so today.

The rabbi wrote three books to substantiate his claims and counter the strong opposition from other scholars. He felt that because this was such a great mitzvah, one should follow it, even if in doubt.

In 1913, Rabbi Isaac Herzog, the chief rabbi of Ireland who later became the chief rabbi of Israel, continued the search. He wrote his doctoral dissertation on the subjects of the biblical blue, "porphyrology," a word he coined, meaning the study of purple. He doubted whether the techelet the Radzyner rabbi found was really techelet and if the cuttlefish was in fact the hilazon.

Rabbi Herzog studied the dyeing process that called for the ink of the cuttlefish to be subjected to intense heat and then mixed with chemicals and colorless iron filings. The resultant dye, he concluded after chemical analysis, was not from the ink at all but rather the commonly used Prussian blue. Nevertheless, scientists point out that even though the Radzyner rabbi was proven wrong and actually produced an inorganic dye, he had started the quest for the true techelet.

Dr. E. Spanier; the late Dr. Edelstein; Prof. Roald Hoffman, a Nobel Prize winner in chemistry; and Dr. Irving Ziderman, a foremost authority on antique purple dyes and the scientific director of the Techelet Foundation, contributed extensively to the study of the hilazon. The animal has now been identified as the murex trunculus, located today as in ancient times along the shores of Israel, Lebanon and Greece (ancient Phoenicia).

Murex trunculus snail

About 35 years ago, when the archeologist Prof. Yigal Yadin discovered caves that had been inhabited by Bar Kochba and his followers during the rebellion against Rome in 2 CE, Yadin found a small amount of wool that had been dyed blue but not woven into thread. Chemical tests revealed that it had been dyed with kala ilan (indigo) of vegetable origin. Referring to the passage in the Gemara which states that indigo and techelet are indistinguishable to the human eye, one could now prepare the dye from the mollusk identified as the hilazon and compare it with the strands of wool found in the cave.

Further proof that the hilazon is the murex trunculus snail was substantiated by a coin unearthed in a cave in the Phoenician city of Tyre. On its face is the image of the murex trunculus snail. Why else would a non-kosher and unimportant animal be on the face of a coin, if not for its role in the commandment of tzitzit?

The riddle of how to produce a violet blue color from the snail was solved by the late Prof. Otto Elsner of Israel's Shenkar College of Textiles in the 1980s. He was researching the methods used by the ancient dyers and noticed that the dye of the murex trunculus female snails tended towards purple, but the wool turned a brilliant blue with the dye of the male snails. The combination of both dyes over a period of many days created the required techelet shade. It has also been proven that exposure to sunlight during the dyeing process could artificially and immediately yield indigo blue.

This step led to further accomplishments, including the researching and writing of a book on tzitzit in 1985 by Rabbi Eliyahu Tavger of Jerusalem. After much investigation, he became convinced that the authentic techelet came from the murex trunculus snail. After many trials, he succeeded in applying the process according to the prescribed ritual from beginning to end.

Gland contains the dye

The gland containing the dye is removed from the snail while it is still alive – because after its demise the color quickly loses its potency. The dye is then put into a beaker containing a solution of chemicals and the wool is dipped in, undergoing an amazing transformation from yellow to green. When exposed to air and sunlight, the color then changes to blue.

Based on Rabbi Tevger's work, the Association for the Promotion and Distribution of Techelet was formed in Israel by Ari Greenspan, Baruch Sterman, and Joel Guberman, three Yeshiva University graduates who made aliya in the 1980s, in order to make the techelet thread available to the general public and provide information about it to observant Jews all over the world.

Today, the association is marketing techelet worldwide, with four techelet threads and 12 ordinary tzitit fringes selling for $70 (US).

A growing number of rabbinic personalities and members of religious communities are wearing techelet and Ziderman is determined to elicit additional rabbinic endorsement for techelet observance. He is also promoting the marine agricultural project of breeding murex trunculus in captivity, thus protecting the species from possible extinction due to maritime pollution and renewing the observance of this long-lost mitzvah.

St. Louis: voyage of the damned

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

As the St. Louis steamed toward Havana from Hamburg, Germany, with nearly 1,000 Jews fleeing the Nazis aboard, Recha Weiler desperately nursed her dying husband, Moritz.

While other passengers enjoyed the elegance of the civilized cruise after the repressions and humiliations of Germany, Weiler spent most of the voyage in her cabin with Moritz.

But her efforts failed. The university professor died aboard the ship and was buried at sea.

An estimated half of the passengers were to die later, after both the United States and Cuba rejected their pleas for refuge, and the cruel 40-day journey sent them back to Europe to face the Nazis.

Some 59 years after the St. Louis' desperate passage back and forth across the Atlantic, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and its Survivors' Registry are trying to trace the fates of its passengers, including Recha Weiler, the 61-year-old widow originally from Cologne.

The St. Louis left Germany on May 13, 1939. Its passengers, most of them from Germany, had expensive documents – some bogus – for entry into Cuba.

When the ship arrived, however, Havana – and the United States – refused to admit them. The St. Louis sat in the harbor for days.

Desperate relatives packed motorboats and approached the anchored liner, shouting messages to loved ones. All awaited the outcome of frantic international negotiations to allow the refugees to disembark.

Ultimately, only 29 passengers were permitted to land in Havana. Then the ship was ordered to leave, maneuvering slowly and tantalizingly near the coast of Florida before turning back to Europe.

On June 17, 1939, the St. Louis docked at Antwerp: 214 passengers remained in Belgium, 224 went to France, and 181 to the Netherlands. Another 288 passengers went ashore in Britain on June 21.

The end of that journey was, for its passengers, the beginning of the Holocaust.

"The fate of the 963 is a microcosm of the Holocaust," said Scott Miller, a researcher at the American museum who is organizing the St. Louis project.

Belgium, France and the Netherlands proved to be only temporary havens, as they were quickly overrun by the Nazis. A large number of the passengers who sought sanctuary there were deported, and perished in the camps. Some went into hiding. Others apparently fled Europe, most likely before 1941.

Miller estimates that as many as 450 of the St. Louis passengers survived – most of them emigrating to the United States.

However, Miller knows of at least eight people who subsequently went to England. Another eight migrated to Israel, two went to Germany, four to Canada, three to Australia, two to France, one to the Netherlands, one to Argentina, and four to Chile.

Miller's estimates do not necessarily reflect the whereabouts of St. Louis passengers today; many have died, while others may have moved on.

One passenger, for example, hid in Belgium during the war, emigrated to the United States, and then quickly resettled in Palestine.

It seems extraordinary that, after being turned away once, the overwhelming majority of the St. Louis survivors still came to the United States after the war. Many must have felt the same sense of betrayal that haunted passenger Wilhelm Sydower.

Voyage of the damned

Sydower had boarded the ocean-liner intent on finding refuge for his family – a wife and daughter he left behind – and had planned to bring them over when a sanctuary was secured.

Instead, he was returned to Europe, and he and his loved ones hid out the war in Belgium, says his daughter, Renee Schifter of Tel Aviv.

After the war, the family returned to Germany. Sydower died within five years, but not before telling his daughter of the journey.

"He told me about the problems they faced to get to a safe shore and how the United States of America, the great nation of immigration, was unable to take in 1,000 people who were in danger of being murdered," Schifter said.

"He told me that the Americans were not much better than the Germans. They did not kill people with their own hands – however, they did not help them in time."

Schifter, who now works on behalf of survivors, refused to emigrate to the United States.

"Instead I went to Israel, because I never wanted to stay in Germany," she said.

Miller suggests that others did go to the United States after the Holocaust because it may have been easier than entering Palestine in 1946-47.

Those who migrated to Israel went at different times, from different places and under different circumstances, he said.

"It was not the original intent of any of them to go to Palestine," said Miller, who did graduate work at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Before Miller's project, little was known about the fate of the St. Louis passengers, in part because the voyage was only the beginning of their Holocaust experiences.

Much of what is known about the survivors is where they were at the war's end, not at its start.

To document the fate of each of the St. Louis passengers, Miller has scoured archives in Israel, the Unites States and Europe. At this stage, he says, the project is nearly complete.

Among the Israeli institutions consulted were the Jewish Agency's Missing Persons Bureau, known for its postwar efforts to locate family members of those who came to Palestine; Yad Vashem; and the Jerusalem branch of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which did extensive relief and resettlement work after the war.

Only 70 passengers remain unaccounted for, says Miller, who has appealed to the public for information.

It is assumed that the 70 survived, because there is no evidence to the contrary. Their names do not appear in memorial books or on shipping manifests, or on lists for deportations, concentration camps or displaced persons camps.

Miller says that the project is central to the mission of the Holocaust Museum and the Survivors Registry, partly because it will assemble information about the U.S. role in the Holocaust.

Miller hopes to trace the remaining passengers by next May, the 60th anniversary of the St. Louis' tragic journey, which became known as the voyage of the damned.

It is believed that a commemoration of the St. Louis voyage could open an international discussion on the American and European refugee policy during World War II.

An independent Swiss panel of international historians, known as the Bergier Commission, is expected to release a report at year's end about Switzerland's wartime refugee policy. Switzerland admitted about 28,000 Jewish refugees, but has drawn international condemnation for turning away another 30,000.

The United States, which also turned away refugees, has yet to be strongly criticized. Its policy on Jewish refugees during the war seems to have been swept under the rug.

Only 29 percent of all Americans know that the United States did not admit all European Jews who sought refuge before or during the war, according to a survey of the American public conducted for the museum, and released last spring.

The survey found that 34 percent were unaware of the American refugee policy, while 37 percent thought the United States admitted, or probably admitted the Jewish refugees.

However, acknowledgement of the United States' not so admirable role during the Holocaust came recently from U.S. Undersecretary of State Stuart Eizenstat.

In two separate reports on the financial ties between the Nazis and neutral states during World War II, Eizenstat talks about the cold response given the St Louis.

In the June report, Eizenstat admitted that "America's response to the early stages of the slaughter of European Jews was largely one of indifference."

Eizenstat noted that the United States accepted only 21,000 refugees from Europe, and did not significantly raise or even fill its restrictive quotas, accepting far fewer Jews per capita than many of the neutral European countries and fewer in absolute terms than Switzerland.

"No country, including the United States, did as much as it might have or should have done to save innocent victims of Nazi persecution – Jews, Gypsies, political opponents and others," Eizenstat said in an earlier report in May 1997.

"Restrictive U.S. immigration policies kept hundreds of thousands of refugees from finding safety in the United States, most tragically exemplified by our refusal to allow the St. Louis to dock with its cargo of refugees – many of whom perished when the ship was forced to return to Europe."

An anti-Semitic lie that wouldn't die

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a notorious anti-Semitic document written in 1894, had dire consequences for the Jewish people in the 20th century.

Many scholars believe the document was plagiarized from an old French satirical pamphlet that attacked Napoleon III.

"Thousands, perhaps even tens of thousands, of Jews have died because of this infamous forgery," Joseph Telushkin wrote in his book, Jewish Literacy.

"Hitler used this book as a manual in his war to exterminate the Jews," wrote Nora Levin in The Holocaust.

Yet, despite its notoriety and grievous impact on Jewish history, most Jews know very little about the document, says an expert on the Protocols.

Hadassah Ben-Itto

Retired Tel Aviv district judge Hadassah Ben-Itto, author of a newly published book on the subject, Hasheker Mesarev Lamoot (The Lie That Wouldn't Die), notes that most Jews have never read the Protocols and still fewer know of the courageous attempts over the years to refute the Protocols' conspiracy theory in court.

"We hear Protocols and we roll our eyes, or snicker, or think, 'Who is going to believe this garbage? Who is going to believe that a group of Jews got together and drew up a blueprint for world domination?' But people do believe it," Ben-Itto says.

The Malaysian president speaks of a world Jewish conspiracy to devalue his country's currency. Palestinian suicide bombers are found with the Protocols in their pockets. The text of the Protocols, and explanations on how the booklet explains perfectly today's news, can easily be found on the Internet.

On October 31, 1991, Ben-Itto, a respected judge who had served a short stint on the Supreme Court, presided over her last hearing. A few months earlier she shocked the country's legal community by announcing her early retirement. Her stated reason: to research and write a book about The Protocols of the Elders of Zion — a subject that became an obsession for her, she says.

If the Jews were painfully uneducated about the nefarious document, she was determined to educate them.

Ben-Itto's journey to the Protocols is an intensely personal one. She immigrated to Israel with her parents from Poland in 1935, at the age of nine, leaving her extended family behind. The dedication in her book reads simply, "To the memory of all my relatives who were killed in the Holocaust, and whose burial place is unknown. Let this be their monument."

But it was not until she served as a representative in Israel's delegation to the UN in 1965, and again in 1975, that she began to feel the power of the Protocols. While she was part of Foreign Minister Golda Meir's delegation to the UN in 1965, Ben-Itto writes in her book, a Russian delegate quoted from the Protocols during a routine verbal assault on Israel.

A Latin American diplomat, surprised that Ben-Itto did not object, told her "You Jews must learn from the past. At the time you ignored what Hitler wrote in Mein Kampf. It is forbidden for you to ignore anti-Semitic libels, and more importantly, don't make light of libel about a Jewish criminal conspiracy to take over the world, as described in the Protocols."

Ten years later Ben-Itto was back at the UN, this time as part of the Israeli delegation during the debate on the "Zionism is racism" resolution. For 10 years we didn't do anything about that, we said 'Oom [UN] schmom,' who really cares, what does it matter?" Ben-Itto recalls.

Then, in 1985, President Chaim Herzog, who had been Israel's ambassador to the UN during the 1975 debate, held a reunion for some key people who were involved.

"At that time I had a very difficult conversation with [former U.S. ambassador to the UN] Jeane Kirkpatrick," Ben-Itto says, "She told me, 'I can't believe that the same thing is happening to the same people twice in one generation. You did not read Mein Kampf carefully. Had you read it carefully you, would have known what was coming.'"

Kirkpatrick's message – one that had a profound impact on Ben-Itto – was that anti-Semitic documents, as easy as they are to dismiss, must not be taken lightly. As an activist in the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, an organization she heads today, Ben-Itto began working hard for the repeal of the UN resolution, and soon after she began researching the Protocols.

"[The Protocols] was important in order to incite the mobs," she says. "Not everyone would be willing to go kill their neighbors, but when it was explained to them that their neighbors were part of a plot to take over the world..."

Although anti-Semitism existed long before the Protocols, Ben-Itto says it undoubtedly helps contemporary anti-Semites by making their job easier. "Otherwise they would not use the Protocols. The fact that it was used to stir up pogroms, that Hitler used it – this shows that it is an effective tool. It helps to explain that by killing Jews you are actually doing a good thing, because they are plotting to take over the world."

Habits accrued by long years on the bench die hard for Ben-Itto, and this is clear in the way she conducts an interview. She focuses only on the matter at hand. Her legal background is also felt throughout the book.

"I felt as if part of me would stay

The book was in the dock

in this court," Ben-Itto writes, describing what it was like to leave the bench after 31 years. "But I carried with me a wonderful feeling of satisfaction and expectation for the future. I knew that I was retiring from the bench, but not from the business.

"Without a court and without a robe, through a giving up of the authority and the chains of procedure, I appointed myself an investigating judge. I was on my way to discover the truth and dispense justice, and the book was in the dock."

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, based on anti-Semitic canards that flourished in the Middle Ages, is a booklet that claims to disclose the secret plans of a Jewish conspiracy for world domination.

"Today I can assure you that we are only within a few strides of our goal," the Protocols reads. "There remains only a short distance and the cycle of the Symbolic Serpent – that badge of our people – will be complete.

"When this circle is locked, all the states of Europe will be enclosed in it, as it were, by unbreakable chains."

There is a major difference, Ben-Itto says, between the Protocols and other anti-semitic calumnies, such as the blood libels.

"The Protocols is first and foremost a political document. It is not something said about Jews – that we kill kids for their blood – but it presents itself as an authentic document of the secret government of the Jews. 'Don't ask us about the Jews,' the anti-Semite says while referring to the Protocols, 'see what they say themselves.' This document is a recipe for control of the world."

It is a recipe that did not come out of nowhere. One of the precursors of the Protocols was a treatise at the end of the 18th century that blamed the French revolution on a secret conspiracy of Freemasons. It did not take long before that treatise was altered to implicate the Jews as well.

The Protocols, as we know it today – and which can be downloaded from the Internet sites entitled, Antizion, and Radio Islam – was based on a pamphlet written by French satirist Maurice Joly in 1864, entitled Dialogues in Hell Between Machiavelli and Montesquieu. This pamphlet was an attack on Napoleon III, and made no mention of the Jews.

Thirty years later it was plagiarized by Pytor Ivanovich Rachkovsky, an officer of the Russian secret police, in an effort to strengthen the new Czar Nicholas III and discredit liberal voices in Russia that were expressing some sympathy for Jews.

Rachkovsky apparently was also helping out the French Right, which wanted Dreyfus to look bad. The Protocols was first published in Russia in 1905, during the failed revolution of that year. An organization called the Black Hundreds wanted to incite against the Jews, whom they blamed for the revolt. The Protocols was published by a mystic priest, Sergius Nilus, and formed part of the propaganda campaign that accompanied the pogroms inspired that year by the Russian secret police.

After the 1917 revolution, Russian emigres brought the Protocols to Europe, where it fell on attentive ears, particularly – but not solely – in Germany, where in 1920 120,000 copies were sold. The Protocols also found its way to England and the United States, where auto mogul Henry Ford promulgated its ideas of Jewish control and domination through his anti-Semitic newspaper The Dearborn Independent.

Hitler praised the Protocols in Mein Kampf: "What many Jews may do unconsciously is here consciously exposed," he wrote. "It is completely indifferent from what Jewish brain these disclosures originate; the important thing is that with positively terrifying certainty they reveal the nature and activity of the Jewish people and expose their inner contexts as well as their ultimate final aims... Once this book has become the common property of a people, the Jewish menace may be considered as broken."

In the '30s there were attempts by Jews to discredit the Protocols in court, with the two notable cases being in Bern, Switzerland, and Port Elizabeth, South Africa. Ben-Itto managed to obtain the transcripts of both trials.

Much of her book centres around the court drama in Bern, which was covered widely by the world press, where in 1934 the Jewish community took the local Nazi party to court for publishing the Protocols.

The lower court judge in Bern ruled that the Protocols was indeed plagiarized from Joly's book and constituted indecent literature, and fined the defendants. He said he considered the Protocols "ridiculous nonsense."

The defendants appealed, however, and won the appeal on the basis that the pornographic clause used to bring the issue to the court was not applicable. But the judges in the appeal also wrote that the Protocols was "trash" and "absolutely unjustified and outrageous insults and defamation."

Over the years there have been various courts and official bodies, including a U.S. Senate subcommittee, that have declared the Protocols to be a forgery. As late as 1993, a Russian court ruled that the Protocols was an anti-Semitic forgery, after the anti-Semitic Pamyat organization sued a Jewish newspaper for libel when the paper said Pamyat was fostering anti-Jewish sentiment by publishing the book.

Yet regardless of how many times and in what forum the booklet has been discredited, the Protocols always finds fertile ground – if not in Europe or the U.S. – then in Arab states, where it is often sold and even more often quoted.

Ben-Itto says that in Egypt some copies of Shimon Peres' book The New Middle East were distributed with an insert that read: "When The Protocols of the Elders of Zion was revealed 200 [sic] years ago and translated into many languages, including Arabic, the Zionist movement tried to deny the existence of a conspiracy and said the document was a forgery. The Zionists even tried to purchase all the copies of the book to prevent its distribution. Now Shimon Peres is providing eternal proof that the Protocols was correct and what was said inside them was accurate. His book serves as a step in carrying out the dangerous plan."

Jews 'make light' of book

The Jews, Ben-Itto says, do not take the written doctrines of anti-Semitism seriously, and do not try to refute them. This stems, she says, from a fatalistic approach, an attitude that looks at anti-Semitism almost as something that descended from heaven; something that was, is and always will be. As such, this attitude holds, there is nothing that can be done to combat it.

"In my opinion," Ben-Itto says, "we have been so hurt by anti-Semitism for so long, that we have given up, raised our hands, and said the world will always be anti-Semitic.

"This book is not intended to fight anti-Semitism," Ben-Itto continues. "Anti-semitism is another story. The purpose of this book is to come and compete with a lie. Let's say that someone in the world is saying terrible things about you, that you are a murderer and a thief. Would you say it doesn't matter? Of course not."

Hasheker Mesarev Lamoot is not meant for the anti-Semites, Ben-Itto says. "They will not read it, or if they read it, they will deny it. It won't stop them from being anti-Semitic.

"But by not refuting the Protocols, the idea of a Jewish conspiracy has thrived and spread even among enlightened people – not only anti-Semites. I have run into so many people who said there is something to this. When I tell them it is a fake, a forgery, they ask me why we don't say so, why we don't reject it. That is who I am addressing in the book, enlightened people – first Jews, but also non-Jews."

Ben-Itto wrote the book originally in English, and then translated it into Hebrew. About half way through the writing, a German publisher showed interest and bought the rights. It was published in Hebrew and in German. Negotiations are still under way with a publishing house to bring the book out in English.

"The German publisher is making great efforts to publicize the book over there – you have no idea how serious they take these matters over there, because they know where it can lead," Ben-Itto says. "Der Spiegel dedicated four pages to it – not so much [to] the book, but the issue of the Protocols. German Television sent someone over to do a story. They are interested in uncovering the truth about the Protocols, because they understand the harm it can do."

Everyone understands what damage the Protocols can wreak, Ben-Itto says, except the Jews, who are ignorant of the subject, and often make light of it. "I have actually heard politicians here say that the Protocols is a good thing, because people will think we have strength, and will respect us."

The Protocols, Ben-Itto points out, is available in almost all the world's languages, save one – Hebrew. "Don't we care what people write about us?" she asks.

In Israel, Ben-Itto points out, there is a tendency to wink at the mention of the Protocols, and – from time to time – to refer to an international Jewish millionaire, jokingly, as an "Elder of Zion."

"We have become horribly superficial," she says. "We cheapen words and concepts horribly – like when we use the term Nazi loosely, when we use the word Holocaust to refer to many things, and how if someone doesn't give us 12 points at Eurovision, they are anti-Semites. We use these terms, including the Protocols, so often that they lose their importance."

It is a "scandal," Ben-Itto says, when terms such as anti-Semite and Nazi and Protocols become part of the accepted lexicon in internal Israeli debate. It cheapens these concepts, she says and "deprives them of all their sting. When I was at the UN in 1965, an Iraqi called us Nazis. To back up his claim he brought a protocol from an [Israeli] Supreme Court hearing where the justice minister at the time argued in front of the court, and said the IDF behaved toward a group of Arabs at the time like Nazis.

"The Iraqi delegate at the UN said, 'We say they are Nazis, look, they say it themselves.' Someone could say, 'They say we are anti-Semites, look, they hate Jews themselves,' and then point to Haredim on Rehov Bar-Ilan shouting anti-Semites [at the police]. We are emptying the words of their content by cheapening their usage."

History of the book has everything

The history of the Protocols has everything – forgery, passion, lies, deceit, fascinating historical characters, secret agents, court tension, drama. Were the history of the Protocols made up, it would make riveting, sensationalistic paperback writing. Tragically, it is all too true.

Nevertheless, Ben-Itto writes her book in a way that brings the drama behind the Protocols to life; concentrating on what she understands the best – courtroom drama, particularly the landmark trial in Bern. "There are numerous books and articles written by academics on the Protocols, footnoted and found in university libraries, and only someone who is interested in the Protocols will seek them out,"she says. "I decided to write this book for the wider public."

Judges often find themselves watching witnesses faced with having to refute a lie. "You have to give people the tools to refute a lie," Ben-Itto says, hoping her book will provide people with a tool needed to refute a lie that has stuck to the Jews, with awful consequences, for more than a century.

"Millions of copies of the Protocols have been distributed. Don't we have a responsibility to place the facts on the table and say, 'Whether or not you want to believe me, these are the facts.'

"Don't we have a responsibility,"asks Ben-Itto "to set the record straight?"

Shofar: one of the most mysterious mitzvot

By CHANA FALIK
WZPS

"And in the seventh month, on the first of the month, you shall have a holy celebration, it shall be a day of blowing the shofar for you." (Numbers 29)

Rosh Hashanah is characterized by one of the most mysterious mitzvot in the entire Torah – blowing the shofar. Every other major holiday in the Jewish calendar finds us eating certain symbolic foods (such as matzot at Passover) or performing certain actions (such as learning Torah all night on Shavuot), or saying special prayers (the confession of sins on Yom Kippur). Rosh Hashanah, ironically, even though it is the first day of the Jewish year and the birthday of Creation, has none of these customs. It seems as if when Rosh Hashanah's turn came for mitzvot, God in His love, teased His people by giving them a mitzvah that they could perform literally through their sense of hearing.

The shofar is one of the earliest musical instruments known to man. It is made from the horn of a kosher animal — except for cows, which lost out on the "privilege" following the sin of the golden calf. Shofars tended to be made from the horns of the animal most prevalent in the country Jews lived in: in Ashkenazi Europe, for example, they were usually made from rams' horns, whereas in Ethiopia they were made from the horns of kudus, or African antelope.

The size of a shofar doesn't matter, as long as it is bigger than the width of a man's hand. The largest curlicued kudu horns stretch the length of an entire arm.

Each shofar has its own distinctive sound. According to professional musician and shofar blowing instructor David Lloyd Perkins, the longer the shofar, the easier it is to play and produce harmonics.

"On a short ram's horn I can get three harmonic tones," says Perkins, "but on a long kudu shofar I can produce between nine and 12 harmonics."

Perkins has blown his shofar in such diverse locations as the roof of the Vatican in Rome, and in Seoul, Korea, on Israel Independence Day 1995, when he was an official representative of the Israeli government.

According to Perkins, playing the shofar is not difficult at all. "Even the 3- and 4-year-olds in my classes play the shofar wonderfully," he says. Sometimes, though, he says, "the mouthpiece cut into the shofar is too small, which is very often the case with the factory-produced shofars." What should the correct mouthpiece size be? "Big enough to be comfortable for human lips," says Perkins, who heats the ends of his shofars in order to enlarge the mouthpiece.

Harmonics, note range and tone are very important when the Rosh Hashanah shofar sounds are taken into consideration. There are four distinct sounds for the Rosh Hashanah service. The blast (tekiah), one long blast with a clear tone, the broken (shevarim) sighing sound of three short calls, the alarm (teruah), a rapid series of nine or more very short notes, and the great blast (tekiah gedolah), a single unbroken blast, held as long as possible.

In fact, no one really knows what a teruah sound should be. It could be a shevarim, a tekiah or a combination of both. On Rosh Hashanah, several combinations are used to accommodate the various rabbinic opinions, says Perkins. "The more a shofar's mouthpiece permits the blower a wide-range of harmonic sounds, the more sincere and profound the shofar experience is for the listener."

To add to the irony of the shofar blowing mitzvah, the command is given to us in the Torah without explanations. Thankfully, Torah sages throughout history have provided many interpretations to the meaning of blowing the shofar. Maimonides, the medieval Jewish philosopher and physician, likens the reason to a wake-up call to all Jews. In his Laws of Repentance, Maimonides writes: "Awake, sleepers from your sleep! Arise, slumberers from your slumber! Scrutinize your deeds, return to repentance and remember your Creator. Those who forget the truth in the vanities of time and those who stray all their year in vanity and emptiness which can neither help nor save, look into your souls, better your ways and deeds! Let each of you abandon your evil way and your thoughts which are not good."

A return to the beginning

The famous List of 10 Symbolic Meanings of the shofar as taught by Rav Sa'adia Gaon (Rabbi Sa'adia the Genius) is still studied today — over 1,000 years after it was first published in the early 900s. Among them are: The shofar sounds remind us of the Revelation at Mt. Sinai, where the children of Israel in perfect faith told the Lord, "We will do and we will understand." The shofar sounds remind us of the words of the prophets, which in the Book of Ezekiel (chap. 33) were compared to the sounding of a shofar. "And whoever hears the sound of the shofar and takes no warning — if the sword comes and takes him away, his blood shall be on his own head; because if he had taken warning, he would have saved his soul." The shofar reminds us that the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) is just around the corner, only 10 days away. Time to get down to the eternally important business of repentance!

Rosh Hashanah is a return to beginnings — the beginning of Creation, the beginning of the yearly cycle, the beginning of autumn — and the shofar, with its otherworldly calls, unlocks our heart to God and to ourselves by allowing us to make a new start. With this comes the knowledge that the mitzvah of the shofar, in the end, isn't as mysterious as we thought it to be.

Women and the IDF

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

The following is an interview with Brig. Gen. Orit Adato, head of the IDF Women's Corps

Q: What is the role of the Women's Corps today?

A: The Women's Corps has two main roles. First and foremost, we deal with realizing the potential of the women soldiers and officers in the IDF. Secondly, we deal with aspects unique to women in the army, such as women's medical care and behavioral norms with respect to sexual harassment. The latter is done by instructing and training women soldiers, commanders and male soldiers in all aspects related to this.

We also deal with sexual discrimination, which I prefer to call placement that is not related to the actual job qualifications. That is, placement on the basis of gender and not on the basis of objective considerations.

Our first area of concern, realizing potential, is the most important. It links up with the fact that we are speaking about the State of Israel and the IDF. If we look at the world map, it's clear that we do not have a relative advantage in size or in numbers. The only relative advantage that Israel has in general and the IDF in particular is the quality of its human resources. In order to maintain this advantage, we have to be able to realize our existing potential. This is a point that is very relevant to women because there is no doubt that women's potential in the IDF today is still not fully realized.

Q: One of the measures of women's advancement in the IDF has been the move away from clerical positions. What percentage of women are engaged in clerical jobs today?

A: This is one of the subjects that testifies to the involvement and integration of women in meaningful positions. The drop in the percentage of clerical workers is due to two factors. One, technology is advancing. There is less of a need for clerical workers. And two, women are being integrated into other jobs. Overall, 30 percent of the women soldiers in the IDF are in clerical positions as opposed to 50 percent 10 years ago.

For example, women first began working as combat instructors 10 years ago. Today, this system, including artillery, engineering, infantry and tanks, is almost entirely based on women instructors. The bulk of instruction in basic training for non-combat soldiers – more than 60 percent – is carried out by women.

Most of the non-combat training is carried out by women

Another area that women have moved into is land, sea and air warning systems. Along the Lebanese border, women soldiers serve in two capacities: in operations rooms, where they are responsible for relaying information directly to forces in the field, and as lookouts in advanced outposts along the border – those still in Israel. Here they are responsible for observing a specific area and discerning the slightest changes, which they pass on immediately to commanders in the field.

Another aspect is the reserves, the IDF's main force. The entire reserve system is administered and called up by women soldiers.

These three examples indicate how women, even though not directly involved in combat, contribute to the IDF's central aims through combat support positions.

Q: In many countries, including the U.S. and Canada, women are fully integrated into the armed forces. Do you think this is a model for Israel and are there any reservations?

A: No. I don't have any reservations. I would be very happy to close this office the minute what has happened in the U.S. happens here. That is, that men and women who are drafted are at the same jumping off point and can reach the same positions.

We have to close the gap between the IDF and other armies. We are the only army in the world that has compulsory service for women. In all other armies, even if there is compulsory service for men, the women are volunteers. And in a large percentage of these armies, service for both men and women is voluntary. This is a significant difference. As long as that service is compulsory and the jumping off point for men and women remains different. The Women's Corps is necessary in order to realize the two central aims that I have spoken about.

New job openings for women

Q: What are the obstacles to full integration of women in the IDF?

A: There are three significant differences between men and women's service in the IDF. One, is the length of service. Once, when men served 30 months and women 24, this difference was not so important. But over time, men's service has been lengthened to 36 months and women's service has been curtailed to 21 months. This influences the professions and jobs into which women are integrated.

The second is that women do not serve in combat positions or in combat areas. There are exceptions. For example, we have women in pilot training who, when they finish the course, will be integrated like every other pilot. There are also women who serve with the Border Police in combat positions. In August 1998, women soldiers were incorporated as combat soldiers in anti-aircraft units. We already have women doctors serving in the field. But these are the exceptions and not the rule today.

The fact that women do not serve in combat areas is an even more critical limitation because it means that even in jobs that do not require combat skills, women cannot be assigned to them if the unit will be sent to a combat zone.

The third difference preventing full integration is the fact that women in almost all cases do not serve in the reserves. If the bulk of the army's forces are the reserves, then the fact that very few women serve in them significantly influences the quality of women's service.

Q: Can women attain positions from which they are now excluded?

A: I believe that we can. We are moving ahead but at an evolutionary pace, not a revolutionary one. One of my jobs is to be the catalyst for this change, to expedite this process.

Q: Do you see women in combat positions in the future?

A: Yes. We see from other armies that there is chronological order to the advancement of women and we apparently are following this pattern.

[Cont'd. on page B59]

Two of the first women to become tank instructors in the late 1980s. Today, the majority of tank instructors are women. [WZPS photo]

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5759

Enjoying a lighter moment during training.

Serving along Lebanese border

The first places where women are accepted into combat positions are in the air and naval services. With respect to the air force, we are already there with the entry of women into pilot training and in anti-aircraft. The subject of women serving in naval officer training programs is now coming up before the Supreme Court.

We are now at the threshold of the 21st century. Warfare is taking on a different orientation. It is more technological, more toward pushing buttons rather than brute force. I see women being integrated more and more into technological warfare.

Women have a number of characteristics that are important for leadership – their ability for team work, to accept someone who is different, to listen. These are important and can improve leadership. Women have been integrated into management and command positions in the army with great success.

Q: In the U.S. military, recent surveys have found a high percentage of women soldiers who have been subjected to sexual harassment and there have been a number of highly publicized cases that have even included rape. Doesn't a Women's Corps in some sense protect women from these abuses?

A: We are dealing with the problem from the opposite direction. Today, sexual harassment in the army is being treated very seriously even before we have full integration. What we are doing includes dealing with incidents, but mainly involves training, information and enactment of laws in order to change the army's behavioral norms. The minute that behavioral norms change and there is a higher recognition and awareness of sexual harassment, the next stage of full integration will take root in much more hospitable ground.

Q: What new jobs are opening up for women?

A: Women are moving into technical positions such as electricians and mechanics. Women are also becoming truck drivers. We now have women assistant-base commanders. We have women security officers in the air force responsible for base security.

There is one place opening up to women soldiers that makes us smile – the kitchens. As much as this traditionally has been a woman's place, in the army there are almost no women in the kitchens. And so we are trying to get women back in the kitchen, especially in the field units.

Every year, some eight to 10 permanent positions open up to women. The aim is to integrate women into the army as much as possible in accordance with their ability and talents, taking into consideration the ability of the system to absorb them and the qualifications necessary for the job. This is the policy – of course, within the limitations that I have mentioned.

Female pioneers often idealistic

By ALLISON KAPLAN SOMMER

Golda Meir

Many people think of Golda Meir as the archetypical Israeli woman, a tough pioneer who rose to the pinnacle of political power.

But when she first arrived in Palestine, with 10 pairs of shoes in tow, her fellow kibbutz members at Merhavya rolled their eyes and wondered whether the pampered American would be able to make it in the new country.

According to Joseph Glass, an adjunct professor in the Department of Geography at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, such reactions were a typical response of the chalutzim to the thousands of North American women who arrived in Palestine between the two world wars.

Glass' research, done under the auspices of the Laufer Centre for Women's Studies at Hebrew University, has focused on North American women who chose to leave comfortable lives for the uncertainties of life in Palestine.

The North Americans who arrived between the world wars made up between 2.5 to three percent of the total Jewish immigration to Palestine at that time. What characterized them as a group was their intense idealism and the fact that, unlike the immigrants from Europe, who often fled poverty and oppression, the North American Jews came of their own free will.

"It wasn't so easy for them to get here," explains Glass, who is originally from Toronto and is also affiliated with the university's Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies and the Centre for Contemporary Jewry."There were only a certain number of entrance certificates allotted to immigrants, and sometimes there were 200-300 candidates vying for 25 certificates. Those who received them were very excited.

"One woman, Dorothy Ruth Kahn, recalled in her memoirs the moment when, after years of waiting, she finally held her certificate in one hand and her passport in the other, leaving America to fulfill her dream."

That idealism took different forms, leading the American immigrants to take varying paths in their new land, according to Glass. He classifies the female immigrants of the time into four groups.

The first was made up of older haredi women who came to live out their days in the holy land under the auspices of organizations such as Kollel America and Tiferet Yerushalayim. Their husbands studied at yeshivot mainly in Jerusalem and Tiberias, while they kept house.

Even if a woman was widowed she would usually prefer to remain in Palestine, and be buried beside her husband, rather than return to her children in North America.

Palestine was generally the third stop for members of this group. Most were originally from Eastern Europe. They immigrated to the U.S. as children and grew up there.

Few of these women wrote about their experiences and so records of their lives are difficult to find, Glass says. They were sometimes difficult to distinguish since they blended easily into the community of Eastern European Haredim, with whom they shared a great deal in terms of their Yiddish origins and very traditional lifestyles, he notes.

Most from Eastern Europe

While the first group of women came to continue their traditional lives in a different location, the second group came with dreams of utopian revolution, says Glass.

The pioneers who settled in the kibbutzim dreamed of creating a society characterized by socialism and equality between the sexes. Meir was part of this group (though her subsequent commitment to sexual equality as a politician and leader has been called into question by feminist critics).

Throughout the 1920s and '30s, groups of women trained in camps in the United States and Canada which had been started by the socialist youth movements. The aim of the camps was to equip the fledgling pioneers with the practical skills needed in Palestine.

The majority of these women chalutzim worked in the areas for which they trained in North America: raising chickens, agriculture, or teaching school. Meir was atypical in that she didn't engage in manual labor for long before finding her niche in leadership within the Labor Zionist movement.

From socialist dream to capitalism

"Over the years I've had an opportunity to meet with these North American immigrants, some of whom are still living on their kibbutzim," Glass says.

"What is hard for many of them today is seeing their dream of a wonderful form of socialism going in a capitalist direction.

"For North Americans who left a capitalist society to build something new it is particularly hard to see so many of the kibbutzim being privatized."

Glass adds, however, that the women he interviewed in this group did not seem too disappointed that equality of the sexes had not developed to any greater extent within the kibbutz system. In most cases, women stayed in traditionally female jobs.

"There is a sense that this evolved because of the will of the women themselves, and not because they were forced into matriarchal roles," Glass says.

The third group of women he categorized were responsible for founding many of the communities in which English-speaking immigrants live today, such as Herzliya and Ra'anana.

This was a group of middle-class Jews, most of them urban, who in the early 1920s "had a colorful, biblical dream of a rural lifestyle: picking grapes from vines, oranges from the trees," he says.

"They would organize into groups and purchase tracts of land. In addition to Herzliya and Ra'anana, there was Balfouria, just north of Hadera, and Gan Yavne. These families had a specific agricultural dream, and both men and women were busy with agriculture and livestock."

The lives of these North American immigrants were well-chronicled by women such as Canadian writer Molly Lyons Bar-David, who wrote My Promised Land in 1953 and also contributed to the Jerusalem Post.

In her book, Bar-David describes her life in the small orchard community of Gan Hasharon, now part of Kfar Saba, where she immigrated as a child.

"At one point in the book she describes her mother's immigrant experience," Glass says. "She (Bar-David) conveys the sense that such women took a very maternal view of the land and its relationship to the people. As she tended the green gardens, taking care of her family, full of hope, at first living in difficult conditions, the dream was very strong for her, as was her sense of fulfillment."

In the late 1920s, the atmosphere changed in these isolated rural settlements. With the Arab riots in 1929, and increased Arab hostility, pioneer life in the country became less appealing and more immigrants from North America joined the fourth group Glass describes – the urban dwellers.

This group consisted of white-collar workers who brought their professional skills to their new country – medicine, social work, engineering, accounting, and in the case of many of the women, stenographic and secretarial work.

Their excellent English skills were appreciated in a land that was still under the British Mandate, Glass says. The members of this group, many of whom came from

Part of exciting social experiment

American Modern Orthodox families, had strong Jewish values and were responsible for establishing some of the major synagogues in the urban centres, he adds.

Within this group were some unconventional, older, unmarried Jewish women, who contributed significantly to the country and whose work can still be subtly felt in many aspects of society, Glass notes.

"These were second-generation American-born Jewish women with good educations who came here to be part of an exciting social experiment and a new nationalism."

Among the most conspicuous was Henrietta Szold's dedication to the Hadassah medical organization, but there were other outstanding examples, too, Glass says. "There was Julia Aharonson, who worked in the field of diets, encouraging new immigrants away from their eastern European traditional way of eating toward a healthier, more varied diet.

"In education, Deborah Kallan established a school in Jerusalem based on the ideas of John Dewey; and Jessie Sampter, an American Jewish poet who moved to Rehovot in the 1920s, organized activities for young girls and initiated classes to help Yemenite immigrant women learn to read and write and advance themselves."

Not every immigrant was cut out for life in Palestine and so there was return migration, too. Glass estimates that 30 to 35 percent of the North Americans left Palestine – a far higher percentage than other immigrant groups – because they had the option of returning to a secure life in their country of origin.

They went back for a variety of reasons: an inability to adjust to society or the harsher way of life, or missing family. He says that one individual from frosty Saskatchewan left Ra'anana, she claimed, "because she just couldn't stand the climate."

Like the women on Merhavya who looked askance at Meir's shoes, there was some envy on the part of veteran pioneers and Eastern European immigrants toward the arrivals from the U.S. and Canada. But, Glass stresses, that envy was mingled with respect.

"Because they came here of their own free will from a place like North America, many of the Jews in Palestine saw the Americans as the demonstration of true commitment to the Zionist ideal."

Glass is interested in any archival material dealing with the lives of North American immigrants to Palestine between the two world wars, and requests that any readers with such material contact him through the geography department at the Hebrew University.

Israeli students tops in math

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Special to The CJN

In the Third International Math and Science Study (TIMSS), an evaluation of educational achievement, 12th graders from 58 Israeli high schools achieved a score of 557 points, placing them first among 21 participating countries. Russian students came in second with 542 points, and Swiss youngsters were third with a score of 533.

Israel's results for physics were also good, with Israel securing fifth place in the world after Norway, Sweden, Russia and Germany.

"We were, of course, delighted with these results," says Prof. Zemira Mevarech, chief scientist of Israel's Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport. "We knew the level of mathematics in Israel to be very high, but it's still important for Israel to know where it stands relative to other countries. This was why we took part in the TIMSS study."

The study is carried out by Boston College, and funded by among others, the National Council for Educational Statistics, the U.S. National Science Foundation and the Canadian government.

The study has taken place three times since 1950 and Israel has participated all three times. U.S. President Bill Clinton has based U.S. educational policy, in part, on TIMSS findings.

Encouraging as the recent study's results are for Israel, Mevarech cautions against complacency. "Our results are good, but they're drawn from a small and select group," she says. "Only seven percent of Israeli 12th graders take advanced math, compared with up to 20 percent in other countries."

Israeli fourth and eighth graders, who also took part in the study, took tests in math and science, and in both grades the students emerged in the middle stretches of the 42 countries taking part in this section of the study.

"This result doesn't demonstrate any determination in skills or ability," says Mevarech. "First, it's a comparison of apples and pears – advanced math was tested among the 12th graders, and math and science among the younger children. Teaching can, of course, always be improved, but the fourth and eighth grade results are not alarm signals."

Israeli students are good at advanced math because they are taught by teachers who use up-to-date, high-level teaching methods and special computer programs. Moreover, students and educators regard the advanced math course as important and prestigious.

Mevarech said she was disappointed to discover that "Gender differences still plague math in Israel. Significantly more boys than girls still select math and physics, and they usually do better in these subjects than the girls. Our gender gap, in fact, emerged in the study and it's this gap we must work to close. Other countries – a prime example is the United States – have succeeded in closing this gap over the years, and we must now concentrate on doing the same."

The ministry is examining issues such as: Where does the gender bias come from? Does Israel society emphasize achievement for boys over girls, and is this something that the schools reflect? Do teachers and parents encourage boys more than girls in math? Are math textbooks oriented more toward boys than girls?

"We're just at the beginning of our investigation," says Mevarech, "but we're also examining programs that have been used to close the gender gap elsewhere, to see if we can adapt them for Israel."

According to statistics from previous years, most students who participated in the study will pursue advanced study and academic careers. These statistics show that proportionately, Israel has both a high number of students in the world studying math and physics in a post-high school framework, as well as a proportionately large number of PhDs in math and physics.

Ethiopian theatre troupe breaks out

By WENDY ELLIMAN
WZPS

Shouting and screaming, crying and laughing raucously is considered immodest behavior among Israel's Ethiopian community. Reticence, reserve and a smiling face is the Ethiopian way, no matter what emotions churn inside.

So when in 1994, Natala, Israel's first Ethiopian theatre troupe, was founded, "they found it very difficult to open up on stage, western style," says the troupe's director, Yaffa Schuster. "Their acting teachers literally had to force them into expressing the emotions of the characters they played, and into making emotional demands on one another during a performance. The fact they can now do this with professional ease is one of Natala's major successes."

The Natala troupe (named for the traditional white veil or shawl that symbolizes the Ethiopian heritage) was founded when American anthropologists Ferdy and Shari Davis wrote a play in English called The Stone Shoe, to help visiting American groups gain a better understanding of Ethiopian Jews. The play brought together most of the people who went on to write and perform the unexpectedly successful Black Natala, written in cooperation with Schuster and her co-director, Sharon Levitan.

Black Natala tells the story of three young Ethiopian Jews on their desperate journey to Israel. In words, music and dance, it plays out a love story in the desert, evokes the dangers of the long trek, and conveys the struggle of many Ethiopians to reconcile the reality they find in Israel with their long-held dreams.

"We performed Black Natala all over Israel more than 40 times, and even once in Budapest," says Schuster. "Successful as it was, however, we knew it wasn't good enough. We planned, as soon as we could, to build a program to teach Natala's actors classical stage skills – movements, acting, stagecraft and voice development. It was vital for them to bring something new to the Israeli stage; to be more than black actors presenting their rich heritage as quaint folklore, and to turn Ethiopian culture into an international culture. For this they needed the training of western repertoire theatre."

So in 1996, when the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC)-Israel linked with the group, they created a specially designed one-year program in theatre at Jerusalem's School for Performing Arts, in conjunction with the Jerusalem Foundation, the Jerusalem municipality and the school itself. The troupe's 20 performers, 16 Ethiopian Israelis, a former Australian, a former Iranian and two Israelis, who were provided with stipends by JDC-Israel, recently graduated the program.

In Ethiopia, as in much of Africa, traditional performing is in the form of storytelling, not theatre. "Storytellers can speak for hours on end, and the good ones have high social status," says Yehiel Fran of JDC-Israel. "To perform in Israel, Ethiopians just needed to make the transition from one form of the art to another."

Although many in the troupe hope to turn professional, all currently have other jobs and responsibilities. Tehilla Yishayahu, 24, who came to Israel with Operation Moses in 1984, for example, is studying for high school matriculation. "I have two young children and a full study program, so it was really hard to fit in 10 hours a week of theatre as well," she says. "But I wanted a way to express myself, and it's important for me to continue with Natala."

Tamir Tamiat, 29, Natala's senior actor and co-writer of Black Natala, has a small telephone business in downtown Jerusalem. "When I opened the business, I started missing some of my theatre classes," he says. "But Natala is important to me. Its success is the success of Israel's entire Ethiopian community. So I make an extra effort to keep on coming."

Marsha Tov, formally of Melbourne, Australia, is one of Natala's four non-Ethiopian members. "We whites are part of Natala because it's Israeli theatre," she says. "But we're the minority, the strangers. In the new production, for example, we get the outsiders' roles – the lost child, the prostitute. It's a challenge to work with any group and perhaps our different cultural perspectives make working in Natala more of a challenge than usual. But I love it and hope to continue."

Shai Fredo, assistant director for Natala's second production, a surrealistic play unconnected with the Ethiopian experience, hopes to be a movie director. He was among 400 applicants for 19 places at the Jerusalem Film Institute last year. "I wasn't accepted but they told me to reapply next year," he says hopefully. "In the meantime, I help direct and act in Natala's new production and work nights as a security guard."

The new production, now in rehearsal, Bavel (Babel), is dramatic testimony to how far the troupe has come. Written by Natala members themselves, it is a series of powerful, surreal encounters: a garrulous father stares into the distance, painting compelling word-pictures of where he comes from and what he wants, while his daughter stands motionless, intoning "Yes, papa," over and over, her feelings a mystery; a small energetic man sweeps across the stage, trailing an oddly dressed assembly of people after him, anger, fear and excitement coursing through them; a woman in a green sheath appears at the back of the stage, shouting urgently in an unknown tongue (Swedish, as it turns out). The others shout back in a polyglot of languages, the confusion between them absolute; a child and her grandmother play and talk together, love overflowing from every gesture and syllable. Each successive scene, seemingly disconnected, draws an intense emotional response.

"We've worked very hard, and we'll work much harder," says Schuster, "because we know that we're doing something worthwhile, and doing it well. We're very aware that Natala is not simply 'black actors on stage' or 'poor Ethiopians'. By drawing from the fountain of Ethiopian culture and marrying that with western stage skills, we believe we're creating not only a new form of art, but also a voice that can help Ethiopians be better absorbed into Israeli society, and bring different parts of that society closer together."

Israeli author Gur tops book lists

By SHELLEY KLEIMAN
WZPS

One day, at age 39, Batya Gur woke up and decided she wanted to become a writer – so she did.

Now 50, Gur popularized the detective genre in the Israeli literary canon and has become one of Israel's best-selling novelists abroad.

Her first three mysteries (a fourth has not yet been translated into English) have made it onto the New York Times' annual Notable Book List, an impressive feat for any writer not to mention a foreigner and a whodunnit novice to boot. Her books have been translated into French, German (she won Germany's Crimi Prize), Italian, Dutch and Japanese.

But her success is first and foremost local, so much so that this native Jerusalemite is currently writing a portrait of Israel's capital city. Her books are all best sellers – a fact that leaves her not a little bit uncomfortable. Painfully shy, Gur fidgets in her chair at a crowded Jerusalem cafe as if waiting to have a tooth extracted.

"I hate being asked personal questions," says Gur, a trim, woman with striking green eyes and pale blonde hair.

Gur began writing only nine years ago, when she suddenly became tired of teaching high school and got fed up with working on her master's thesis on the Israeli poet Natan Zach. She launched her writing career with a detective novel because, she says, it's the least presumptuous genre. "If I failed, nobody would notice," she explains.

Gur's murders take place in self-contained insular societies – the Jerusalem Psychoanalytic Institute (The Saturday Morning Murder, 1988), the Hebrew University's literature department (Literary Murder, 1991), and a kibbutz (Murder on a Kibbutz, 1991). For her fourth mystery (Orchestral Murder, 1996), Gur ventured into the world of musicians.

To solve the murders, Gur introduces readers to Inspector Michael Ohayon, a shrewd observer of the human condition who solves cases by getting into his suspects' shoes. Israel's first home-grown detective is also very different from Gur: He is male and the son of Moroccan immigrants, while she is the daughter of Holocaust survivors.

Batya Gur

For Gur, the appearance of the detective genre is indicative of a nation's maturity.

"Totally realistic in an unrealistic way, it is a serious genre in that it is so ironic," says Gur. "I think we've become grown up enough to take a look at ourselves through this finely tuned microscopic lens."

After completing her third mystery, Gur took an imaginative leap of faith and wrote I Didn't Imagine It Like This, a novel with no crime and no suspects whose main character is a female gynecologist. Just released in Hebrew is Stone for a Stone. The story of a mother whose son is killed in an army related accident, Gur's second non-mystery novel is receiving rave reviews in the Israeli press.

Gur lights one cigarette after another, as do many of her characters, a rather dated trait in these health-conscious times.

"I am rather anachronistic, anyway," Gur offers between puffs. "I am also old-fashioned; I like to have a door opened for me and enjoy being helped on with my coat. And," she takes a deep breath, "I hate the politics of feminism."

Gur maintains a busy schedule. She gets up at 6:30 a.m., exercises at a local gym, and is at her computer by 8:30 a.m. Aside from writing novels, Gur, a voracious reader, also has a weekly book review column in the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz and teaches creative writing twice a week at the Jerusalem Film and Television School. She avoids television and the social literary scene and enjoys cooking, classical music and the beach. She also finds time for her children – two boys and a girl, ages 20, 18 and 13.

How does she do it all? Gur shrugs. "I don't know; it does sound impressive when you put it on paper," she admits, looking at her watch. "Oh dear, I really must go," she apologizes and hurries off to her next appointment.

Israel Experience lets youth see Israel

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

Many Diaspora youngsters would be unable to visit Israel were it not for the Israel Experience programs offered by the Jewish Agency's Department for Jewish Zionist Education. An estimated 8,000 Jewish youths from around the world visited Israel on such programs this summer. At Jerusalem's Rose Garden in July, 3,500 of them gathered to salute Israel's 50th anniversary before marching to a rally at nearby Mount Herzl.

Statistics show that most participants on Israel Experience summer programs return to Israel repeatedly, often for more extended stays and even aliyah. Jessica Feldman, 22, from North York, Toronto, was a counselor leading a Young Judea youth group from Canada.

"I was a teenager on an Israel Experience program when I first came to Israel and now I'm back for the eighth time," she said. "I've fallen in love with the openness and friendliness of the people and the diversity of the landscapes. I love hiking in Israel, from Nahal Hazbani in the north to the Red Canyon near Eilat."

A graduate in Sociology and Human Resources from York University, which included a one-year program at the Hebrew University, Feldman has now chosen to spend a year in Israel studying at yeshiva. "I've become very interested in Orthodox Judaism," she said. "I'm not Orthodox but I'd like to find out more about it."

Many of the youngsters were in Israel for the first time. Sarah Linsk, 15, from St. Paul, Minn., found that Israel was not quite what she expected but she loved the country anyway.

"There are a lot of very attractive places in Israel," she observed, "but it's also very run down in other places. Despite my disappointment, I still really like it here. I immediately felt a strong sense that this is my land and my people."

Program helps strengthen Jewish identities

Linsk was spending 25 days in Israel on the Etgar program. Organized by the Jewish Community Centres (JCC) of the United States, together with the Jewish Agency, Etgar brought 150 teenagers to Israel this year. For Linsk, the two highlights of the itinerary were floating in the Dead Sea and praying at the Western Wall.

"I'm not an especially religious person," said Linsk, who irregularly attends a Reform temple. "My views about God and religion are very unclear. And I must admit I'm coming away from Israel even more confused on the subject. We have heard so many conflicting ideas here about religion, but I think I'll start lighting Shabbat candles on Friday nights when I return home."

Though Linsk took pleasure from the fact that everybody in Israel is Jewish, she also enjoys being part of a small minority in St. Paul. "Not only is there no anti-Semitism at home," she said, "but people are interested in Judaism. I like that."

In contrast, Kimberly Frank, 17, also in Israel for the first time on an Etgar Israel Experience program from Kingston (near Scranton), Penn., does not enjoy being the only Jew at her school.

"There is a lot of anti-Semitism where I live," she said regretfully. "I've been called a dirty Jew at school and some anti-Semitic slogans were spray-painted on a nearby Reform temple."

For Frank, the highlight of her visit to Israel was climbing Masada at four in the morning to see the sunrise over the desert to the east.

"Most of all, visiting Israel has restored my pride in being Jewish," Frank said. "I feel very proud when I see what has been achieved here. I think I'd like to come back to do a one-year program at the Hebrew University."

The Israel Experience program was integral in strengthening the Jewish identites of participants in Israel for their first time.

"I really feel as though I am part of the Jewish people here," said Loren Dunn, 16, from Needham, Boston, Mass. "I feel a part of something much larger. In the United States, I go to temple on the High Holy Days, but Judaism has not been central in my life, even though it is a basic part of my identity. People in America don't usually believe me when I say that I'm Jewish, because I have blond hair and don't look Jewish. That makes me angry."

For Dunn, who was in Israel for five weeks on a North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY) program, the highlight of the trip was participating in chas-

sidic dancing in Jerusalem's Zion Square.

"I'm beginning to understand what it means to be Jewish," he added. "This program has definitely changed me. When I go home, I'm going to attend temple more often."

While most of the Americans were in Israel for the first time, the Europeans were mainly veteran Israeli visitors. Simon Buckman, 16, from Finchley, London, described Israel as his second home.

"I have been drawn back again and again since I first came here when I was 12," he said. "My mother's sister lives here and I have a lot cousins. When I was 14, I spent five months studying at Youth Aliyah's Yemin Orde school."

Buckman spent a month in Israel with 43 other English teenagers on a Federation of Zionist Youth (FZY) program. For him, the highlight of the trip was visiting Jerusalem's Old City. "I'm always surprised by its beauty," he said.

Buckman comes from a traditional family. "We go to synagogue every Shabbat and I'm not allowed to watch soccer on Saturday. We've always been taught that Israel is central to Judaism. I'll make aliyah as soon as I'm old enough."

Maureen Meyer, 15, from Geneva, Switzerland, was in Israel for the 18th time. She was touring the country with the American Etgar program, which she had found and applied for through the Internet.

"This is the first time I've come to Israel without my parents," she said. "We usually come at Pesach and the High Holy Days. This is the first chance I've had to tour the country from the Galilee to the Negev and I've been really struck by how people have had to fight to develop Israel.

"I feel I am a part of everything that is going on here," she continued, "and I'd like to do a one-year (learning) program."

According to Dr. Ben Eliezer, director general of the Jewish Agency Department for Jewish Zionist Education, Israel Experience programs "are being seen increasingly as the most effective way to strengthen Jewish identity and reinforce a sense of pride in being Jewish."

Hana's Story

"When my husband died, he was only 25 years old and our children were both under the age of three. We had been in Israel less than a year and I had no family here to turn to. I don't know what I would have done without Naomi, the lawyer that Na'amat provided free of charge."

Ilanit's Story

"Dan beat me for 18 years! I was afraid all the time. I took my nervous tension out on my children until they became rude and nasty to me like their father. Then one day, I phoned the number that Na'amat publicizes to let people like me know where to go for help. Its been two years since Dan and I began going to a Na'amat Counselling Centre for the Prevention of Domestic Violence."

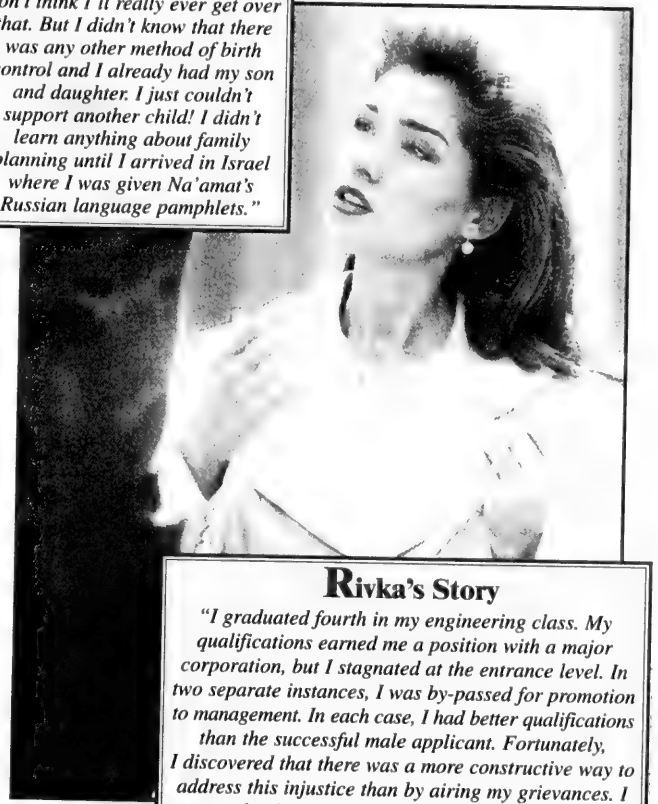
Management Skills Training

Na'amat has established university-level courses which prepare Israeli women for upper management positions. Also funded by Na'amat are management training seminars and classes in entrepreneurial skills.

Natasha's Story

"I had four abortions in Russia. I don't think I'll really ever get over that. But I didn't know that there was any other method of birth control and I already had my son and daughter. I just couldn't support another child! I didn't learn anything about family planning until I arrived in Israel where I was given Na'amat's Russian language pamphlets."



Rivka's Story

"I graduated fourth in my engineering class. My qualifications earned me a position with a major corporation, but I stagnated at the entrance level. In two separate instances, I was by-passed for promotion to management. In each case, I had better qualifications than the successful male applicant. Fortunately, I discovered that there was a more constructive way to address this injustice than by airing my grievances. I took a leave of absence to attend Na'amat's Management Skill Course at Haifa University.

Netanyahu talks to The CJN

AN ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

Israel Meir Lau, Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi, appears to be making a humorous point with Abuna Paulos, patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church before the official opening recently in Romania, Bucharest of the 12th international religious meeting of senior clerics organized by the Catholic community of St. Egidio from Assisi, Italy. [RNS/Reuters photo]

JERUSALEM — This past year has been particularly difficult for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He has demonstrated on many occasions his ability to be a political survivor, even when pressures are applied from within Israel and abroad at the same time.

Several times his fragile coalition has seemed ready to fall apart and propel the country towards a new election. At the 11th hour, however, he has always managed to reconcile with his coalition partners.

Exclusive

Just this month, it seemed that the cabinet was in disarray over next year's budget. Most ministers threatened to vote against the adoption of the new budget, each minister adopting a partisan approach to his own interests.

In the end, however, there was another compromise. Netanyahu easily won, with 14 ministers voting in favor of the 1999 budget, and only two against.

The opposition has also helped Netanyahu as a result of its own internal difficulties and lack of firm leadership.

The prime minister is holding fast to what he calls reciprocity in the peace process. The preoccupation of President Bill Clinton at home has perhaps enabled Netanyahu to adopt a less flexible attitude than he might otherwise have done.

Last week, the prime minister spoke to The CJN's Edgar Asher in the cabinet room at his office in Jerusalem.

CJN: Since the signing of the Oslo accord five years ago, 279 people have been killed by terrorists. This figure is greater than that in the 15 years prior to Oslo. The Palestinian Authority (PA) violates the Oslo accord on an almost daily basis by, among other things, attempting to set up de facto governmental institutions in Jerusalem. What is being done about this?

PM: There have been about 20 attempts to set up illegal de facto governmental institutions in Jerusalem. We keep shutting them down; the number has now diminished considerably. They [the PA] had about six or seven full-scale institutions operating in the eastern part of Jerusalem including the Orient House. All the leaders of governments, prime ministers and foreign ministers came there one after the other.

We changed that, obviously, and shut down those institutions, but there are continuing efforts of encroachment. The battle for Jerusalem is continuing on [illegible]

Practising any part of Judaism or celebrating anything Jewish was totally forbidden by the Nazis at Auschwitz because they knew it could give solace to people.

So we weren't allowed to mark any Jewish occasion. But this particular year when I was there, some of the older women – and by older I mean they could have been 40 or 35; you know, to a 15-year-old, everybody who is over 30 looks old – asked these two specific kapos for permission to do something for Kol Nidre.

Some of the kapos were quite awful, but some of them were very kind. We knew that the two we spoke to were approachable. One of the kind kapos, I remember, was a tall Polish woman, non-Jewish. The other was a little red-headed young woman, a Jewish girl from Czechoslovakia.

So we told them we would like to do something for Kol Nidre.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

Benjamin Netanyahu

Message from the prime minister of the State of Israel Benjamin Netanyahu on the occasion of Rosh Hashanah 5759

Israel remains an isle of stability

Dear Friends,

As we approach Rosh Hashanah 5759, I want to wish you a good year, a year of peace and prosperity for the Jewish people everywhere.

It is characteristic of our people that we do not consider the onset of the new year an opportunity to revel.

Instead, we review the past year with trepidation, and look forward to the next with awe and determination to improve. This applies to governments as well as individuals.

Today, I believe we can view the achievements of this government with some satisfaction. We have managed to stabilize the economy by dramatically bringing inflation down, privatizing publicly owned enterprises at an unprecedented pace, attracting more foreign investment than ever, and deregulating the currency. In the world's economic turmoil we have remained an isle of stability.

We have also addressed ourselves to one of the most troubling problems in Judaism – the proposed conversion law and its ramifications. For the first time since the establishment of the state, we have attempted to find a solution which will avoid the need to resort to litigation and legislation. The recommendations of the commission headed by Ya'acov Ne'eman should form a basis for progress in the direction of unity and cooperation.

In the past year, the government has devoted considerable time and energy to the peace process. We are committed to the Oslo and Hebron agreements and we have made clear our readiness to make the concessions required by these agreements.

But we have also insisted that the Palestinians comply with the commitments they have been making for five years now, particularly in the fight against terrorism, both by word and deed. It is time they rejected the Palestinian Covenant which calls for Israel's destruction, and it is time they cracked down on the infrastructure of the terrorist organizations which now operate openly and freely in the Palestinian Authority areas.

Despite the difficulties which are an inevitable part of such a complicated process, I have no doubt that we shall achieve peace with security for Israel and our neighbors. I also hope that with the help of the democracies we will also be able to remove the dangers to world peace posed by the predatory regimes in the region.

We have good reason to be proud of the state's achievements as we enter its second half-century and approach the 21st century. But we must not forget that the realization of the Zionist dream – the ingathering of the Jewish people in the land of Israel – is not yet complete. Our goal for the next decade must be to have a majority of the Jewish people living in Israel.

The challenges we face are still formidable. To meet them, we must be united in purpose, strong in resolve and unbending in faith.

I wish you all a year of peace, security, health and happiness.

JIAS plans mission to rescue ex-Soviet Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Warning of an "impending social disaster" and rising anti-Semitism in Russia and other ex-Soviet republics, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) is embarking on an urgent drive to bring over as many Jews from the former Soviet Union as possible.

"We're shifting to emergency mode," said JIAS national executive director Michael Briks.

JIAS is meeting this week in Ottawa with officials from the Citizenship and Immigration Department to discuss how Jews from the former Soviet republics can be brought to Canada before the Russian winter sets in and before all social order breaks down.

Through its Montreal office, JIAS is hoping to organize a mission as soon as possible to Moscow, St. Petersburg, Kiev and other cities, with a view toward bringing out as many Jewish families as it can.

Jewish immigrant and advocacy groups around the world are watching developments in Russia carefully. Officials with JIAS' international arm, the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), returned recently from Russia and Ukraine, saying that Jews in both countries are bracing for trouble.

According to the U.S.-based Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, in addition to the financial and political crises in Russia, there is a rising tide of neo-fascism and anti-Semitism.

Letters from Russia to relatives in Canada report pronounced shortages of supplies and foodstuffs, and skyrocketing prices, Briks said.

As well, the harsh Russian winter is around the corner.

"We're dealing with some really serious stuff there," Briks told The CJN. "I think most Canadian Jews are really concerned."

Children and seniors are expected to be hit especially hard.

This Thursday's meeting with federal officials will revolve around how emigres' paperwork can be expedited, Briks said.

A memo from Briks to Barry Silverman, chair of JIAS' Montreal regional council, warns of political and economic turmoil in the former Soviet Union, and repercussions for Jews.

Political, economic turmoil in country

"The perils of yet another frigid Russian winter, coupled with the rapidly diminishing purchasing power of the ruble, present road signs for inevitable hardship and suffering for our Jewish brethren," Briks stated.

He added that "every effort" must be made to secure funding for a JIAS mission to Russia and other countries, notably Ukraine and Belarus.

A mission would take place under the Montreal office's aegis. Three prior JIAS missions to the former Soviet Union, the last one some 18 months ago, each yielded about 100 Jewish families.

Briks said the Quebec government, which establishes its own immigration rules, has been "very sympathetic" to the plight of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

The immigrants would come to Canada in the family reunification category. Once here, they could move from Quebec or make a claim for refugee status, Briks said, because Russian Jews once again have "strong and valid" stories of persecution.

More and more officials in Russia and other ex-Soviet republics "are turning their backs" on Jews and tolerating anti-Semitic incidents, he said.

One recent report noted there are dozens of neo-fascist newspapers sold openly in the streets and subways of Moscow.

Prof. Aurel Braun, a University of Toronto expert on Soviet Jewry, says the appointment of new Russian Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov does not bode well for Jews.

When he was foreign minister, Primakov "consistently" adopted a pro-Arab line, urging arms sales to Iran and cozying up to Iraq's Saddam Hussein, Braun said.

Domestically, Primakov has lashed out at bankers and businesspeople. "These are code words for Jews," Braun said.

Primakov will have more power than any prime minister since 1945, Braun added.

"Things look bleak and dangerous" in Russia, he said. "There are reasons to be worried. For Jews, emigration is more prudent than staying."

The Hamas ideology

It is only natural that the anger and the indignation expressed in the western world after the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam would abate, as it has.

The strikes by American forces in Afghanistan and Sudan seemed to "satisfy" the public's need for a measure of retaliation. Moreover, societies simply cannot sustain such intense feelings of red-hot anger for long stretches of time. In addition, and perhaps most germane, there have been other distractions in Washington occupying and preoccupying people's attention.

But suspicion for responsibility for the bombings has fallen with some certainty on militant Islamic fundamentalists. In particular, the mysterious expatriot Saudi multi-millionaire Osama bin Ladin appears to have either masterminded or inspired the attacks.

Bin Ladin shares with groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad an outlook on western life that boldly, proudly propounds the use of extreme violence against the United States and Israel. Indeed, even as this column is being written, security forces in Israel are on alert against possible revenge attacks by Hamas for the execution two weeks ago of two top Hamas operatives, Imad and Adel Awadallah.

Israelis, unfortunately, are far more familiar than are North Americans with the underlying philosophies of radically militant groups such as Hamas, and of radically militant individuals such as Osama bin Ladin.

Two excellent, highly informative articles on bin Ladin and on militant Islamic fundamentalism recently appeared in the New Republic. I reproduce key portions of them for CJN readers.

The first article (Aug. 31), written by Peter Bergen and Frank Smyth, was entitled Holy Warrior. Bergen and Smyth are seasoned foreign affairs journalists.

Their article is essentially in three parts: the elaborate furtive "protocol" required to see bin Ladin, the man's background, and his record.

The following brief excerpt explains his call for jihad. "His followers treat him with the utmost deference, which he seems to take as his due. And, although he speaks in a near whisper, his talk is of bitter injustice and merciless revenge. The United States, he said…'has committed acts that are extremely unjust, hideous and criminal' by supporting Israel and imposing sanctions on Iraq. But it is the presence of U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia, the land of Mecca and Medina, 'the holiest place of the Muslims,' that most outrages bin Ladin – this he says, is why he has declared a jihad on the United States."

The second article (Sept. 14 and 21), entitled Unholy War, was written by Steven Emerson. Emerson has written frequently on terrorism's connection with Islamic fundamentalism.

The nub of Emerson's article is to call upon American foreign policy to recognize and challenge the dangers posed by militant Islamic fundamentalism.

Throughout the article, Emerson is at pains to differentiate between Islam and Islamic fundamentalism. "Islamic fundamentalism," he writes, "represents a minority wing that would impose religious doctrine from an earlier historical era." He later adds that "the vast majority of Muslims worldwide do not support violence."

But in equal measure to the understanding and respect he shows for Islam as a religion, he holds only contempt for the radical evil embodied in the mercilessly violent doctrine of the militant fundamentalists.

It is important that readers gain a sense of the reasoning behind the Hamas doctrine.

"Driving Islamic militants," Emerson explains, is a fear that the Christian west, abetted by the Jews, is bent on destroying and subjugating Islam. Sheik Yusuf al-Qardawi, one of the world's most revered Islamic clerks, has written that 'we are being confronted by the unrelenting – and infiltration – of secularism, communism, Zionism and Christianity' and that Islam is the victim of a 'devilish alliance of Zionist, Christian and atheist powers for a vicious and united campaign against Islam and Muslims.'

"Sheik al-Qardawi, whose Web site contains a religious sermon condoning the killing of Jews…exhorts Muslim youth to impose Islam by 'fighting' or, alternatively, to give money to warriors waging jihad."

It is a dangerous doctrine that radical, militant Islamic fundamentalism preaches. It stands four-square-ly against the west.

Western governments must have the courage and the conviction to defend the western way of life, with all its imperfections, against all terrorists, let alone militant Islamic fundamentalism. But it is the latter group which is vocally, vociferously and violently waging war against the values on which the western way of life rests: the rule of law, democracy, freedom and justice.

We must retreat neither from the battle nor from our western values.

Emerson provides a prescription: "If the battle against bin Ladin is to be won, then it will require a systematic effort to isolate and undermine the ideological underpinnings of militant Islamic theology."

Canada must be part of that effort. It must not only fall upon the shoulders of Israel and the United States.

Shira Herzog's column of Sept. 17 contained an error in the headline. The headline should have read "On bullets and ballots" rather than "On bullets and ballets."

Hull denies remarks in meeting with Jewish, black leaders

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bobby Hull, the Golden Jet of hockey fame, has denied that he ever spoke favorably of Adolf Hitler or that he defamed the black community.

"We appreciate his clarification, but we will not be the judge of what he said. That is up to the courts, and we have full confidence in the justice system," said Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen at a press conference with Hull in the CJC offices last week.

Ronen was referring to a libel suit launched by Hull and his attorney, Tim Danson, against the Moscow Times and the Toronto Sun for libel and defamation relating to stories carried in those publications about remarks he is alleged to have made in a Moscow interview.

Hockey legend Bobby Hull meets the press last week at CJC headquarters. [Ron Csillag photo]

Ronen told the large media gathering, amid flashing bulbs and TV cameras, that he welcomed Hull's support for a national Holocaust memorial in Ottawa and the attention it brings to the Holocaust "the single most important event in Jewish history."

In answer to many questions about why the CJC was taking part, Ronen said it had a duty to respond.

Both Ronen and Antoni Shelton, of the Urban Alliance on Peace Relations, a black leader, said they welcomed Hull's explanations.

"We want the facts to be divided from the fiction," said Shelton. "At the moment we do not know what the truth is."

Hull said he wants the libel suit tried in Belleville, Ont., where he started in hockey in 1949. A member of the Sports Hall of Fame, he wants an apology and retraction from the newspapers.

An executive of the Toronto Sun said there would be no apology from his newspaper and that Hull's argument is with the Moscow Times, which printed the original story.

In a prepared statement read to a private meeting of Jewish and black leaders prior to the press conference, Hull said: "To my mind Adolf Hitler was the most evil and despicable person who ever lived and there is nothing good or positive that can ever be said about such an evil man."

He said the black community has made an "enormous and very positive" contribution and "I have nothing but respect and admiration for the black community."

Hull visited the Holocaust Memorial Centre in the same building and told the reporters that the night before, he had seen a documentary, The Eighty-first Blow, about the beating of a Jewish boy in the Holocaust and could not sleep because of the images it created.

He said he has written to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien asking him to ensure a national Holocaust memorial in the capital.

Several times reporters asked Hull why he had asked for the meeting with Jewish and black leaders and the hockey star replied firmly that he had done so to defend his reputation.

Hull denied ever making racist statements during his hockey career, and when a reporter started asking him about a specific incident, Danson advised him not to reply, stating it was a matter for the courts.

The 59-year-old hockey legend said he was "set up" in the Moscow interview and would like to find out why. "There is more to this than meets the eye," he said.

His explanation of the Moscow statements attributed to him was that he was asked "in a generic sense" what if certain leaders like Stalin, the czars or Napoleon returned.

"I said I hoped it would never happen. I might have added that certain leaders went too far. But I never mentioned Hitler."

He said the interview with the Russian agency Tass was interrupted by a third person he did not know, who asked "bizarre" questions.

"I told him 'What do you want from me? I'm only a hockey player.'"

Adding to the confusion, he said, was that a translator was interpreting his remarks, and he believes this may have led to mistakes appearing in the Moscow Times story.

At the press conference here, the antipathy some reporters evinced towards Hull came to a head when a female reporter asked him about instances of alleged sexual harassment. "Who am I to believe?" the reporter asked.

Hull replied: "Believe me, I'm telling the truth."

Shelton said the black community has always felt a kinship with the Jewish community and is concerned about the alleged comments made by Hull.

"These comments must have emanated from somewhere," he said. "How did they get in the public domain?"

Hull said he and his counsel have not decided what financial compensation, if any, they will ask for in the libel suit.

New Austrian law could benefit former nationals

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Former nationals of Austria who apply for and receive Austrian citizenship will be eligible for a package of social security benefits, including a monthly pension.

Austria recently amended the 1993 Austrian Nationality Act, which enables former Austrians to reclaim their citizenship if they were driven out of the country by Nazi persecution or fear of it.

The new amendment was passed recently and goes into effect on Jan. 1, 1999.

It applies to individuals from various parts of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire who settled in Austria after World War I and did not formally acquire Austrian citizenship, said Wolfgang Spadinger, the minister counsellor at Austria's embassy in Ottawa.

Such individuals had not been covered by the original Austrian Nationality Act, he added.

Before it was absorbed by Germany in 1938, Austria was home to about 180,000 Jews. The annexation, or Anschluss, reduced Austrian Jews to second-class citizens and prompted many of them to emigrate.

The vast majority of Jews unable to leave were eventually murdered. It is estimated that 65,000 Austrian Jews were killed during the course of the Holocaust.

According to Spadinger, there are about 1,500 Jews in Canada from Austria.

Spadinger said that those who regain their Austrian citizenship do not lose their Canadian citizenship.

With Austrian citizenship in hand, a person can apply for a pension which, on average, is worth about $300 per month.

Furthermore, Austrian citizens are exempt from existing regulations governing the purchase of property by non-Austrians, said Spadinger.

An Austrian national is also eligible for social assistance payments should he or she reside in Austria.

As well, Austrian citizens, regardless of where they live, can vote in Austrian and European Union elections. Austria is a member of the European Union.

Finally, he explained, an Austrian citizen can acquire an Austrian passport, which exempts the recipient from applying for a visa in many countries.

The amendment of the Austrian Nationality Act comes on the heels of Austria's recent decision to expand a relief fund for victims of National Socialsm.

Two months ago, the Austrian government announced it would add $12 million to a 1995 fund. Under its terms, Austrian Jews who were persecuted by the Nazis can apply for a one-time $8,500 payment.

Further information about the fund and the Austrian Nationality Act can be obtained from Austria's embassy in Ottawa, 613-789-1444.

10 months for cemetery desecration

ST. CATHARINES — A man who desecrated this city's only Jewish cemetery last spring has been sentenced to 10 months in jail followed by three years probation.

The court found that the crime committed by Warren Soles, 20, was "racially motivated against the Jewish community."

The judge ruled that a sentence of 18 months was appropriate but reduced it by eight months for time already served.

As well, Soles must make restitution for the damage he caused at the B'nai Israel cemetery on April 25.

In July, Soles pleaded guilty to one count of concealing a weapon, one charge of mischief over $5,000 and 43 counts of causing indignity to human remains – one each for the 43 tombstones toppled at the cemetery.

Damage was estimated at between $5,000 and $8,000.

Palestinian kid's show calls for a holy war

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli group that monitors Palestinian television is circulating a videotape of a children's show that combines images of cartoon characters with calls for holy war against Israel.

The videotape, which was compiled by a group called Shalom L'Dorot (Peace for Generations), includes numerous clips from the Children's Club as well as excerpts from Palestinian news reports.

The children's program is produced by the Palestinian Ministry of Education and runs on the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation (PBC), the Palestinian Authority's official broadcaster based in Ramallah.

The clips include fiery and often violent rhetoric in connection with Israel. In one excerpt from the Feb. 13, 1998 show, a young girl says: "Oh my sister sings constantly about my life as a suicide bomber. How we remain steadfast, each and every part of your soil I have drenched with my blood. And we shall march as warriors of jihad (holy war)."

In another program (Feb. 6), a youngster proclaims: "When I wander into the entrance of Jerusalem, I will turn into a suicide warrior in battle-dress. In battle-dress. In battle-dress.

"Thank you, thank you," he continues as the adult group leader salutes him with "bravo, bravo, bravo."

Gil Zemonsky, who provided the tape to the The CJN, said its contents illustrate Yasser Arafat's goal of "preparing the next generation" of Palestinian children for violence.

"It's patently obvious what's going on here," said Zemonsky, who described himself as a member of the Israeli nationalist camp. "Arafat is not preparing his people for peace but for the next conflict, for jihad, for war."

Founded in 1994

Zemonsky said he received the tape and related news clippings from David Bedein, an Israeli researcher associated with Shalom L'Dorot. That organization was founded in 1994, one year after Israel and the PLO signed the Oslo agreement that was to usher in a new era of peaceful relations.

According to Bedein, Shalom L'Dorot is a "centrist group with 500 members that is not politically affiliated. Its avowed purpose is to galvanize a consensus within Israel behind the fundamentals of the peace process."

(One article of the Oslo Accords states that Israeli and Palestinian leadership must "foster mutual understanding and tolerance, and shall accordingly abstain from incitement, including hostile propaganda.")

Bedein said PBC on-air content suggests that the PLO covenant, which called for the destruction of Israel, is alive and well and being taught to Palestinian school children.

In Washington, U.S. congressmen are taking the PBC tapes seriously. Doubts have been raised whether the United States should underwrite any of the costs of maintaining the network. Currently, two U.S. agencies provide the PBC with $500,000 (US) annually.

Last May, 62 U.S. congressmen asked Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to formulate a policy "to terminate U.S. taxpayer support for the PBC.

"The PBC...is engaged in a campaign to restrict a free press and promote violent propaganda," the congressmen wrote. "The PBC consistently broadcasts programming that attempts to undermine all the United States seeks to achieve in the Middle East."

In addition to its U.S. funding, PBC also receives more than $6 million in aid from the European Union, according to a report in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Bedein suggested the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) also funds the network, though he gave no specific figures. That suggestion was rejected outright by Christine Skladany, CIDA's chief of media relations, who denied that the agency funded the Palestinian network in any way.

Bedein, who is also a media researcher for the Israel Resource News Agency and founder of the Institute for Peace Education, reported in a recent news article that he confronted Arafat about the TV show when the Palestinian leader was in Oslo last August. Arafat was being led around a conference by handlers and appeared to be "no longer functioning," Bedein wrote.

Taking his queue from his aide, Saeb Erakat, Arafat said he had issued orders for an investigation of the PBC's Children's Club program.

Last March, PBC network chair Abu Ayyash told the Philadelphia Inquirer that "I can't put love songs and dances on television when people are being killed...People sometimes make extreme statements, especially on our live shows," he conceded. "What I won't do, though, is become a branch of Radio-Television Israel. That is what [Benjamin] Netanyahu would like us to do and that is an occupier's mentality," Ayyash told the Inquirer.

"This is the Voice of Palestine. We have to reflect our own culture and our own history."

Same battle, new battleground

September marks the approach of Rosh Hashanah, the end of summer, and the return of diplomats and other emissaries to the United Nations. The General Assembly reconvenes. A pride of lionesque ambassadors, representatives and heads of government, one by one, take their turns at the podium to advance their own causes or to hector the causes of others.

These words are being written on the eve of the anticipated appearance by Yasser Arafat at the dais of the General Assembly in New York. He is widely expected to use the occasion and the forum to launch a new diplomatic offensive against the Jewish state, the centrepiece of which will be a plea of support for his intention to declare an independent Palestinian state less than eight months from now, on May 4, 1999: an old battle, but on a new battleground.

Arafat knows his audience. And he knows that very few listeners, if any, will mutter resistance to his scheme. He has already floated the trial balloon of a unilateral declaration of independence in May 1999. Other than Israel, no country has expressed alarm; no country has attempted to shoot the balloon down. The European Union has expressed its support for Palestinian national independence, as has the Pope and the Kremlin. Nor has the United States explicitly rejected the idea.

Last week, at a meeting of the Arab League in Cairo, Arafat and his lieutenants, were firmly hanging on to the balloon's apogeic, upward flight.

He urged the Arab and Muslim leaders to support him, saying he feared military reprisal from Israel. "We intend to declare a Palestinian state and know that this announcement will be supported by the Arabs," Arafat said. The Palestinian leadership will take a series of measures to secure international support for an independent state...These measures will be internal and external but Israel has started to prepare ways to take over our territories and the army is training for that now," Arafat said.

Unlike the majority of the countries at the UN, Israel has rejected the idea of a unilateral Palestinian declaration of independence. Soon after Arafat addressed the Arab League, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu responded. He warned that Israel would take unilateral steps of its own if Arafat acted on this threat.

The prime minister told Israel media that unilateral action by the Palestinian Authority would render the Oslo agreements null and void. "It would essentially bring about the cancelation of the agreement. Every unilateral action on his part would immediately lead to unilateral action on our part," Netanyahu said.

In the present stagnant peace process between Palestinians and Israelis, there is a real danger that threats and counter-threats will ultimately author their own terrible truth.

Arafat's rhetoric before the Arab League was nothing if not a plea for a pan-Arab military front against Israel for war, the potential start of which he has personally placed on an explosive timer.

And indeed, he knows very well, that a unilateral declaration of independence without a resolution to the final status issues and the issues surrounding sovereignty, would unsettle Jordan as much as it would Israel. But that too is part of his game – to create as much short-to-mid term instability as possible in the hope that any ensuing vacuum would be filled by his authority.

The threat of unilateralism has proven again Arafat's essential inability to grab the beckoning moment of history. The relationship between the leaders, already bereft of any trust sinks deeper into distrust; but distrust carries its own momentum toward disaster. It poisons even further the toxic atmosphere between the two people and the flower of trust, which is the minimum condition for coexistence, withers even more.

Some tips for Montrealers in other cities

Re: "Can't break into closed Toronto scene," (CJN, Aug. 20).

Montrealers are not all left out in the communities they went to. In 1978, we left to go to Calgary and we were well received. Along with South African newcomers, we do very well in the Orthodox synagogues and schools.

I joined Hadassah and ORT and have made lots of contacts there. You can try inviting people to dinners, but that is not a solution. You can make better contacts working as a volunteer in the UJA, Jewish National Fund telethons.

Na'amat is a very friendly organization. All our organizations need new faces to help them. If you are in the 60s groups, go to the day-care centres. The Bloor Jewish Community Centre was very good to me when I was in Toronto, as a tourist for three weeks.

I found being a Jewish school bubbie got me to see how we survive.

Toronto is bigger than Calgary, but we are all one.

Other shuls should offer free seats

When I read the ad from Beth Tzedec offering free tickets for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, I felt tears behind my eye lids.

At a meeting with high school students, a Jewish student said his parents could not afford the cost of attending a shul, and they were refused by the shuls when approached.

I, as the moderator, and my Jewish panelist on a panel of Canadian women discussing racism, were very upset. We could not solve his problem.

If all the synagogues do this we will save a lot of Jews and their children from feeling like outcasts and thus continuity would be served.

Filling the empty seats even from 2.30 to 4 p.m. is a mitzvah.

Women should have right to pray alongside men

Your guest columnist Rabbi Avi Shafran ("The Balkanization of the Western Wall" (CJN, Sept. 10), asserts that for over 30 years the Kotel has been a place where Jews of all affiliations and persuasions have regularly prayed "side by side." Unfortunately that is only applicable to Jewish males.

Some traditions or laws are not valid or correct simply through long-standing usage, and should be tempered by the philosophy that "Right Must Be Done and Justice Prevail." To live up to that standard sometimes requires changes be made, in these circumstances, especially as it applies to Jewish women. Equal but separate is not equal.

A Jewish female is no less a Jew because of her gender. All who emanate from a Jewish mother are natural-born Jews. Is there really some necessity for a prohibition against Jewish women being recognized as equal to Jewish males in all respects – including the right to pray shoulder to shoulder with their male progeny?

"Women of the Wall" can learn from Lubavitch

It was interesting to note the comparison in your article, "Women of the Wall borrow Lubavitch tactic" (CJN, Sept. 10), of the outreach work the Women of the Wall do, to the outreach work of Lubavitch. In the article, Jessie Bonn, a member of the group, had confirmed that, indeed, their inspiration came from the Lubavitchers.

If the Women of the Wall find the work we do inspiring, that's wonderful. Spreading mitzvot to fellow Jews is extremely worthy. However, let them also take their cue from us and perhaps offer Shabbat candles to them instead. There are many mitzvot that are especially appropriate for the women whom they come in contact with, that they are not yet doing.

Says commissars no better to Jews than czars

Re, "No tears for czar Nicholas II" (CJN, Sept. 3).

The author should bear in mind the old Yiddish saying: "Men tor keinmol nit betn oif a naiem kaysse." (One should never pray for a new king to come).

When reading this article I had the feeling that the author was trying to imply that the Jews in Russia were better off under the commissars than under the czars. This is not so. The czars did not execute Yiddish poets because they did not like their poetry. The czars did not exile the Lubavitcher rebbe to Siberia, nor did they turn synagogues into stables. Also, under the czar's jurisprudence Mendel Beilis was found not guilty. We have yet to learn of anyone that had been found not guilty after being arrested and tried by the commissars.

Perspectives

Let us be 'good enough to be better'

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Common wisdom has it that the main feature of Yom Kippur is the full day (plus) fast; that all able-bodied adults refrain from food, drink and other bodily pleasures during Yom Kippur.

That common wisdom is incorrect. The main feature of Yom Kippur is tshuvah, repentance. We fast so that we can fully concentrate on repentance. And those who cannot fast because of life-threatening conditions making fasting forbidden, can still experience the essence of Yom Kippur, by engaging in repentance.

With repentance, we hope to attain kapparah (as in Yom Kippur) – atonement.

Repentance is a well-worn word, which to many is nothing more than a nice theoretical concept. But for Yom Kippur to have meaning, indeed for life to have meaning, it is essential to understand what repentance is, so that it does not merely remain a fancy theory, but is instead, put into practice.

We generally speak of repentance from something, from a wrong that was done or from a right not done. We may be puzzled, coming into Yom Kippur, as to what exactly we have done that demands repentance.

The concept of repentance is ineluctably tied to another concept, one with more shrilling overtones – the concept of guilt. We cannot repent unless we are guilty. But today, no one wants to feel guilty. Guilt is to be avoided.

It may therefore come as a shock to hear that we are all, by definition, guilty. The only way we can avoid being guilty is if we are perfect. But who among us is perfect? In truth, no one.

We tend to run away from guilt feelings. But the moment we realize that absence of guilt is justified only if we are perfect, we have an easier time accepting our guilt.

This is a guilt that is not necessarily related to any blatant wrongdoing, or to any tragic flaw in our character. It is a guilt rooted in the notion that however good we may be, however much good we have done, we could have still done better.

This notion of guilt is much easier to accept, and to integrate into our psyches. The moment we reject any thought that we could have done better, or that we could do better, at that moment we welcome arrogance as our defining characteristic. From there, it is all downhill.

In a sense, even if we had not been given a Yom Kippur, a day to repent, we would have had to invent it. For without repentance, and the guilt to which it is linked, we sink into an arrogance and haughtiness that breed trouble both personally and communally.

So, let us firstly make friends with guilt. Let us realize that guilt is necessary, that guilt is a friend, not an enemy, of our spiritual well-being.

Yes, we can be obsessive about guilt, as we can about almost everything, and in its obsessiveness guilt can debilitate. But that should not deter us from welcoming healthful, invigorating, uplifting guilt into our lives.

Guilt itself is related to another concept, the concept of responsibility. If we were not responsible beings, we could not ever be guilty. If we have no obligations, then of what can we be guilty?

Generally, the tendency is to avoid guilt as if it were some sort of a plague. In the process, we also do whatever possible to avoid blame, because after all, if we were to blame, then we would be (ouch!) guilty.

This brings to mind the story of a high government official who was escorted through a prison on a surprise visit. He encountered an inmate and asked – why are you here? The inmate responded – It is a case of mistaken identity. I am here for a crime committed by someone else.

A bit later the official passed another inmate, and asked the same question. This inmate responded – I was convicted of a crime by a racist jury. I really should not be here.

The official met another inmate, and posed that question. This inmate said that he had grown up in a harsh environment where criminality was normal, so it was not fair to be imprisoned when all he did was follow the crowd.

Finally the official chanced by an inmate who responded to the question with the following blunt response – I am here because I was caught in an armed robbery. I was convicted of the crime and am doing time as a penalty I justly deserve.

The official looked at the warden and said – let this man out of here. There is no room for a guilty person among all these innocent people!

And there is no room for improvement if we constantly place the blame for our fate onto other things or other people. We are thereby saying that were it for the others, we would be perfect, and it is they who are standing between us and perfection.

Enunciating these issues the way I have makes all this argumentation sound absurd, which is good. Because not only does it sound absurd; it is absurd. It is absurd to think we are perfect; it is absurd to think we are blameless; it is absurd to think we are guilt-free.

We are guilty because we are responsible, responsible to ourselves, responsible to our loved ones, responsible to the community, and yes, responsible to the world.

We are not responsible for the world, but we are responsible to the world. That responsibility is simply, within the constraints of our own best ability, to make the world a better place.

There are many ways to achieve this, starting with making ourselves into better people. How do we become better people? By being more aware of and carrying out our primary responsibilities, be they as parent, child, sibling, spouse, friend; by being more alert to others, by being more sensitive to the plight and circumstance of those not as fortunate as we, and by setting aside sacred time for all of the above.

Come Yom Kippur, and we will all be beating down on our torsos. We will go through the alphabet, the full Hebrew alphabet of wrongdoing, and knock on ourselves as if we are guilty of these crimes.

We will, on reflection, ask ourselves the very serious question: Did we really do all these horrible things, that we are expressing our guilt for them?

The answer is a loud no. But if that is the answer, then why do we declare ourselves guilty of robbery, treachery, rebelliousness, and destructiveness?

Because even if we have not robbed, or done some of the other things, we may not have always been perfectly honest or free of any tinge of rebellion or bad advice.

In other words, in all areas of human endeavor, we could do better. The irony of this is that precisely those people who are more alert to all these behavior components, who are much closer to being righteous, are the ones who recognize how much further they have to go to actually be righteous.

For them, attaining righteousness is a never ending struggle, but it is a struggle and challenge that they choose to tackle without slackening. They have no problem with expressing their guilt, because in sensitivity to their full human potential, they know how much is still left to achieve.

On the other hand, those who would like to live easily, without burden, and without challenge, will dismiss any thought of "having a way to go" as relevant to everyone else, but not to themselves.

Yom Kippur comes as an invasion of that protective space, as a rejection of the notion that things are good enough as they are, or that we are good enough as we are.

As far as people are concerned, good enough is never good enough, when it is possible to be better. And being better is always possible.

In Chapters of the Elders (Pirkei Avot) we are urged not to consider ourselves as bad (2:18). If we think of ourselves as bad, then we can subconsciously (and sometimes consciously) justify our faults and misbehaviors as deriving from our natural being.

In the feel-good generation, wherein we have overdosed on self-esteem, all this talk about how good we are, and avoidance of those terrible words like blame and guilt, have only entrenched us in the trap of constantly needing ego-stroking. But it has not made us better.

Judaism has a better way. We dare not brand ourselves as evil, but we equally dare not brand ourselves as good enough. We are best off branding ourselves as "good enough to be better," as responsible enough to be "worthy" of blame, and guilty enough to be motivated to improve.

All this we can do every day. But Yom Kippur is the day we should all be doing this, individually and collectively. That is the key to repentance. And repentance is the key to our becoming what we are capable of being.

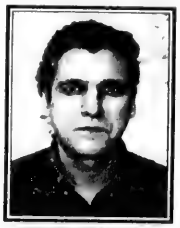
Shedding some light on Israel

It is just past 5:30 p.m. and the lights are on. The afternoon has barely expired and already the Jerusalem sky has faded to a charcoal grey. This, despite the warm temperature outside, the date on my desk calendar and the time on the clock. All would seem to indicate that it's far too early for darkness at this hour.



By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

I have to remind myself I'm in Israel, the land of Chelm, where logic and common sense are so often thrown to the wind. In but the latest example, evening comes early now to the Promised Land thanks to the ever-enlightened folks from Shas, the increasingly powerful ultra-Orthodox party, who rule over the Interior Ministry and well beyond.

Despite repeated surveys that show the overwhelming majority of Israelis are opposed, Interior Minister Eli Suissa recently pulled the plug on daylight saving time (DST) almost two months before Europe and North America. In recent years, it's become an all too familiar scenario. One that points to the sense of frustration and powerlessness many people feel in the face of decisions taken against their benefit and convenience.

There's little mystery to the DST story in Israel where DST could also stand for Disingenuous Shas Tactics. It largely boils down to: Shas gets what Shas wants, and the others be damned. Small wonder there's such growing animosity toward the ultra-Orthodox, especially Shas.

Suissa argues that the DST change is needed to facilitate the early morning slichot prayers of Sephardi Orthodox Jews, the main supporters of Shas.

Without pushing back the clock now, they insist, the Sephardi slichot-sayers would have to do this in the dark before going to work.

Foreigners could be forgiven for asking, 'What's the big deal? What's one measly hour of daylight among compatriots?' Admittedly in a country bedeviled by Palestinian terrorism, water shortages, homicidal drivers and missile threats from Arab neighbors, the issue of daylight saving time could seem a minor concern.

It's not. In Israel, where so much takes place outdoors, one less hour of daylight every afternoon is significant. Especially in the late summer and early fall when warm weather still prevails. DST becomes all the more significant when viewed as yet another basic part of daily life subjected to the dictates of the ultra-Orthodox.

Early this month, Suissa disregarded not only the will of most people but also the recommendations of a special committee studying the issue when he ordered that DST be halted on the first Saturday in September.

In reaction, an editorial in Ha'aretz entitled An Arbitrary Clock said, "Suissa's action takes into consideration a small part of the public that says the early morning slichot prayers, and ignored the vast majority of the public and its needs, causing substantial – and unnecessary – damage to the economy."

According to government figures, each month of DST saves Israel millions of dollars in energy conservation alone. Numerous studies have shown that starting work in the early morning hours when it is still cool, conserves electricity used for lighting and air conditioning, and increases work productivity. It also helps mitigate against traffic accidents more frequent in the intense heat.

For almost two months, people have to rise in the morning with the sun already high in the east and suffer its cruel heat and stronger radiation.

Canceling DST now also takes away some of the pleasure of late afternoons and early evenings during which children could otherwise have another hour to play outside in daylight.

Many observers say Shas's DST decision stems more from a desire to flex its political muscles than out of concern for the praying of some of its constituents. Through its action, Shas can remind secular and Askenazi-religious citizens who's calling the shots.

Within days after the clocks had been pushed back, everyone seemed reconciled to the early darkness. What's the choice? Take to the streets in angry protest against the cancellation of DST when so many other issues of greater consequence are boiling our blood? That's half the problem. There's so much debate here over more contentious, more existential questions that there's little time and energy left to fight for improving the more rudimentary aspects of daily life. As things stand now, the prospects for change look dim – as dim as today's prematurely dark sky.

Absolutophobia

I must admit right off that until several weeks ago I had never heard of the word that headlines this article. Invented by Prof. Robert Simon, who teaches at Hamilton College in New York, it means the unwillingness to say that some behavior is just plainly wrong.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

What led Prof. Simon to create this verbal monster? In his 20 years of teaching he had never found a student who denied that the Holocaust had happened. But, the professor learned, some 10 to 20 percent of his students did not think that killing millions of people was necessarily wrong. One student who held this opinion opined that he disliked the Nazis and added, "But who is to say they were morally wrong?"

The above information comes to me from an article by John Leo, writing in a publication by the Skirball Institute on American Values, which is an agency of the American-Jewish community.

According to the author, a non-judgmental attitude is growing in our educational institutions. Several articles in a leading educational magazine say "that some students are unwilling to oppose large moral horrors – including human sacrifice, ethnic cleansing, and slavery – because they think that no one has a right to criticize the moral views of another group or culture.

It is the prevailing opinion amongst the scholars who have written about this developing attitude that it has something to do with multiculturalism. They believe that while this otherwise admirable policy has produced a respect for others, it has done so to the degree that no moral judgments of any kind are allowed.

Basically, of course, such respect should be welcomed, especially when one belongs to a closely knit religious, ethnic or national group. Says Leo: "In the new multicultural canon, human sacrifice is hard to condemn because the Aztecs practised it. In fact, however, the non-judgmental stance is not held consistently. Japanese whaling and the genital cutting of girls in Africa are criticized all the time by white multiculturalists."

The extreme of this attitude is found in a growing number of people who believe that human beings have no right to lord it over animals. Values are therefore nothing more than personal preferences which are unsuited for criticism or argument – in the same fashion that we don't criticize others for loving pop culture, rock music – or classical music.

The High Holy Days teach, of course, something altogether different. They emphasize the basic fact that in our religion there is a dividing line between right and wrong, good and bad. To be sure, there may be special circumstances that lead to exceptions, but the basic idea remains: human life must be lived in accordance with some fundamental rules that do include respect for others. But that respect ceases when others offend against moral conduct, decency and plain humanity. Judaism is not a "maybe religion," which amounts to very little indeed. It is more than that – and the Holy Days give us time to deepen our thinking about it. Gemar chatimah tovah.

Simplicity that leads to more terror

The American attacks on Osama Bin Laden's base in Afghanistan and on the suspected chemical weapons plant in Sudan brought out a host of critics.

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

While many condemned the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Africa, many commentators chastised the American government for believing that "violence is the appropriate response to violence."

In this liberal view, the appropriate response to terrorism and murder is to "understand" the complaints of the terrorists and their supporters. A former CIA agent, sympathetic to the Arab view, wrote that "terrorism is a phenomenon that can be defeated only by better ideas, by persuasion and, most importantly, by amelioration of the conditions that inspire it." We were told that unless Washington's support for Israel and for the corrupt Arab regimes stops, the "fire in the bellies" of the terrorists will grow, and the plague of terrorism will intensify. The critics also argue that the cruise missile attacks against the terrorists would only lead to more rounds of bombings and retaliation.

This view is simplistic, and a sure recipe for unending terrorism and escalating violence. No government can stand by silently without responding to attacks on its citizens, and leaders who fail to fight back will be replaced. Passivity in the face of violence creates despondency and extremism, and invites even more terror. The immediate impact of retaliatory attacks may be uncertain, but leaders must be able to show that they are able to strike back at terrorists.

Indeed, a sustained military response can destroy the terrorists' infrastructure and deter supporters from providing logistical assistance.

In the 1950s, Palestinians used Jordan to prepare and launch terrorist campaigns against Israel. The intense Israeli military attacks in response were not always successful in the short term, but over many years, the terrorists were weakened and eventually were forced to leave Jordan. The wave of Palestinian terrorism after the 1967 war was also met with force, and in the end, the PLO lost support and was forced to acknowledge the existence of Israel. The threat of terrorism may not have ended, but Israel's policy of retaliation has slowly created a more secure environment.

At the same time, displays of understanding for murderers, and changes in policy to meet their demands bring disaster. Most terrorists are motivated by pure hatred, and will not hesitate to use violence, regardless of their political or economic conditions. Osama Bin Laden is a Saudi millionaire with a fanatical and obsessive hostility to the United States, Israel, and the West. No concessions, changes in policy, or negotiations will change this.

Americans are not the target of terrorism because of their support for Israel (in 1996, Bin Laden bombed the U.S. military base in Saudi Arabia, which was there to protect the Saudis against Iraqi attacks). Rather, the economic successes and political power of the United States and the West stands out against the failures, weakness, and corruption of most of the Arab world, just as the Israeli successes stand out in the Middle East. Jealousy and inarticulate frustration create the obsessions that are the sources of most terrorism, whether directed against the United States or Israel.

Under these conditions, the only actions that might satisfy terrorists and their supporters would reduce the successful states to the levels of the failures. If the United States lost its power and wealth, it would no longer draw the psychological attention of Libya's Muammar Khadafi, Saddam Hussein, the fanatics in Teheran, or Osama Bin Laden. Clearly, this is not an option.

In contrast to the views of the critics, the United States has failed in its confrontation with terrorism by being too soft. The infrequent counter-attacks are generally too little, too late. Although Ronald Reagan's raid against Libya in 1988, following the bomb that destroyed Pan American flight 104, seemed to silence and isolate Khadafi for a number of years, Khadafi is still in power, the perpetrators go unpunished, and the isolation is eroding. The Americans have also failed to be consistent in fighting Saddam Hussein, and the Iraqi dictator is still in power, seven years after the Gulf War. The message is that if they wait long enough, America will forget the attacks, and the terrorists will escape punishment.

The same pattern seems to hold for the Islamic terror networks and facilities located in Afghanistan, Iraq, Sudan, Iran, Syria, or Albania.

One or two indecisive cruise missile attacks ordered by a disgraced and weakened president will not end the terrorist attacks on the West. Unless the United States is prepared to launch a sustained series of attacks against terrorists in their bases around the world, as well as against their state sponsors and supporters, it faces escalating attacks and higher casualties.

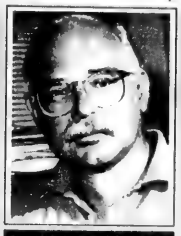
Movies of Jewish interest at Toronto Film Festival



By Sheldon Kirshner

At last week's Toronto International Film Festival, I saw several films of Jewish interest. At least two will open in theatres across Canada shortly.

In Fragments Jerusalem*, a lyrical six-hour documentary, Ron Havilio draws an impressionistic portrait of the city. It is not a travelogue, nor a conventional film, either in form or content. Unfolding through the prism of his family's history, Fragments Jerusalem* fixes images, faces and stories in celluloid.

The Havilios were in Jerusalem long before Israel came into being. On his father's side, the first Havilio – a Sephardic Jew – arrived sometime around the 17th century, when Palestine was a backward Ottoman province. The Rosenthals, his mother's family, settled in Jerusalem in 1812, drawn from Vilna by messianic fervor. When Solomon, the first Rosenthal, set foot in Jerusalem, the city was at its lowest ebb, a sorrowful vista of abandoned houses and walls sprouting weeds.

The film, composed of early photographs and archival and modern footage, is narrated by Havilio. Divided into seven episodes, which conclude in 1947, it turns on the Mamila neighborhood, where Havilio was born and raised. Mamila is outside the Old City's walls, around Jaffa Gate, the former commercial centre.

Badly damaged during the War of Independence, much of Mamila lay between Israel and Jordan, in no man's land, until the Six Day War. In the mid-1970s, the last of the old buildings in Mamila were demolished to make way for a new urban centre. It is a development which Havilio, an ardent preservationist, regrets.

Moving easily between past and present, Fragments Jerusalem* often has the feel of a family album. When his father, Shlomo, a Mossad agent and then a diplomat, is posted to France, Turkey and Cameroon in succession in the 1950s and 1960s, quaint home movies of Paris, Istanbul and Yaounde flash across the screen.

No matter what the distance, Jerusalem is never far from Havilio's mind. In 1968, when he returns to Israel from Africa, the concrete walls separating eastern and western Jerusalem are torn down. As the film – which is dedicated to his three daughters – proceeds, Havilio explores the reclaimed Jewish Quarter, chronicles his army service in Jerusalem, and introduces us to his wife Jacqueline, whose Polish parents owe their lives to Oskar Schindler.

In the second episode, Havilio shows us how European diarists, painters, lithographers and photographers from the 16th century onward depicted Jerusalem. There are glimpses of the Wailing Wall (as it once was called), the Dome of the Rock, Mt. Zion cemetery and the Palestinian village of Silwan.

Jerusalem, Havilio observes, reached its nadir in the opening decade of the 19th century, when its population was less than 10,000 and its Jewish, Muslim and Christian residents were enveloped by poverty. One French traveller, Havilio notes, wrote of "Jews in rags" and of "dust in Zion."

In chapter three, Havilio focuses on his mother Haya's ancestors, Solomon and Isaac Rosenthal, both of whom were pious metal engravers.

Thanks to a letter he wrote to Sir Moses Montefiore, Isaac's place in Jerusalem's history is assured. Citing overcrowded conditions, Isaac urged the British philanthropist to buy land outside the old walls. Complying with his suggestion, Montefiore touched off a building boom that would forever change the face of Jerusalem.

The neighborhood he built was called Mamila.

From that point onward, for the next three hours, *Fragments*Jerusalem* develops a host of related themes dealing with, among other topics, his grandmother Sarina and the childhood memories and the coming of age of his father against the backdrop of political turmoil in Palestine.

By any yardstick, Fragments Jerusalem* is far too long. But even when its self-indulgence is taken into account, its poetic powers and its incredible factual completeness shine through.

Bryan Singer, a young, unknown director, catapulted to fame in 1995 with The Usual Suspects, a clever, Byzantine thriller with as many twists as a roller-coaster. When the news trickled out that he was working on Apt Pupil, a film about a Nazi war criminal who is unmasked, I was intrigued. Could he pull it off again?

Regrettably, he has not done so. Based on a novella by Stephen King, Apt Pupil, which opens at the Cineplex Odeon chain on Oct. 16, is a meandering mess, and certainly no Schindler's List.

The raw ingredients of a compelling movie about the nature of evil lurks somewhere in the script. But in the telling, Apt Pupil degenerates, ruining Singer's chance for a second consecutive hit.

Todd Bowden (Brad Renfro), a 16-year-old American high school student, develops what can only be described as a morbid fascination with the Holocaust. Long after his teacher has finished his week-long survey of the topic, Bowden immerses himself in the topic. No reason is given for his obsession, and a viewer is expected to accept it at face value. This gap is the first flaw in Apt Pupil, which begins with a chilling montage of Nazi Germany's leaders.

On a bus, Bowden recognizes an old man from a photograph, and he believes him to be Kurt Dussander (Ian McKellen), a former SS officer who lives quietly under the assumed name of Arthur Denker. A month later, Bowden knocks on Dussander's door, confronting him with his evidence. Bowden wants to hear his grisly stories of the concentration camps, of the gas chambers which consumed Jews with industrial efficiency.

Dussander is reluctant to cooperate, but relents when he realizes that the alternative is exposure and imprisonment in Israel. As their tense and bizarre relationship ripens, Bowden loses interest in the opposite sex and his grades fall precipitously. At this juncture, Dussander turns the tables on Bowden, and the pair become locked in a game of psychological warfare which runs amuck.

As the drama rises, the film is deflated by two silly and gratuitous scenes involving a cat with a primal sense of self-preservation and a nearly incoherent drifter whose apparent knowledge threatens Dussander.

Even without these useless segments, Apt Pupil wanders aimlessly, frittering away its dramatic tension, never really coming to grips with its broad philosophic theme and not fleshing out the main characters (who are competently portrayed by Renfro and McKellen). In short, it's eminently forgettable. A pity.

Is there mirth to be mined from the Holocaust? Judging by the Italian-language film, Life is Beautiful, there is levity in misery.

This gentle Chaplinesque fable, directed by Roberto Benigni, is about Guido (Benigni), a Jewish waiter who rebels against his destiny, albeit with a measure of laughter.

Guido appears nonplussed by the passage of anti-Semitic race laws in Italy and by the appearance of anti-Jewish signs over shops. And when he and his son, Joshua, are taken away to a concentration camp, Guido shields him from its harsh realities by convincing him that they are really playing an elaborate game.

Benigni's satire, sincere as it is, doesn't really work. You can't make light of the Holocaust. That's axiomatic.

Our standards are our true Bible code

The Bible Code by Michael Drosnin claims to predict events using a computer and a Bible.

Proof of Judaism's genius doesn't lie in secret codes. Jews understood long ago that the real Bible code's are not hidden in a computer. On Kol Nidrei night, we stake a claim on Jewishness by coming to synagogue; we assert the true Bible code, standards that define us as Jews.

One standard is belief. Before his death, Moses overlooked the Promised Land. Blessing Israel's 12 tribes, to one he said, "O, Naftali, satisfied with favor and full with the blessing of Adonai." Mystics interpreted it this way. "O, God-wrestler, be satisfied with desire and fullness."

Who are the God-wrestlers? You and I, to the extent that we struggle for the infinite in the midst of our finite lives on earth. We are the ones whom Moses blesses when we want more of Divine Presence, for our very wanting eventually satisfies that desire.

There's a second code – belonging. A Russian artist tells that the internal passport clerk offered a deal. "You look Armenian. Why put Jew in your passport? Put Armenian, and things will go easier." She thought about it and asked her father who said, "You decide."

Memories flooded back

Memories flooded back. She recalled her first day of school, when all students stood and told their nationality. They began: Russian, Russian, Russian, and she stood and said, Jewish. Did she need this history-inflicted deviation from the Soviet norm that would always cost her opportunity? She could change it with the stroke of a pen.

Then she decided. At the document centre she put in her credentials: "Yevrei," Jew. She belonged to Am Yisrael. We go to Kol Nidrei and we, too, belong.

The third code word is behavior. In the Torah (Deut. 1:41), B'nai Yisrael say to Moses, "We have sinned against God." They offer to fight as God commanded but the Holy One says no, ki eineni bekirbechem, for I am among you. But the Hebrew literally mean, "I am not inside of you." The Israelites' confession consisted of empty words. Their heart was not in it.

Our challenge on Yom Kippur is to modify our behavior by making a confession that we truly mean, and then acting upon its significance.

Bible codes? How about belief, belonging and behavior?

Chassidic music online

Last week, we looked at the vast chassidic storytelling resources that you can find on the World Wide Web. While stories teach Chassidim profound lessons about past leaders and future behavior, song uplifts their souls. Today, chassidic music on the Jewish Highway.

As a starting point, I highly recommend Song in Chassidic Life [http://www.jewishmusic.com/articl02.htm]. In this fascinating essay, Velvel Pasternak traces the role of music from the days of the Baal Shem Tov to the present. "Music for Chassidism is not only the accompanying motif of one's life but the companion of the Chassid's eternal journey."

Curiously, some of the most moving and distinctive chassidic songs have no words. Pasternak quotes the first Lubavitcher Rebbe "Melody is the outpouring of the soul, words interrupt the stream of emotions." A melody with text is limited in time, for with the conclusion of the words the melody, too, comes to an end. But a tune without words can be repeated endlessly. Although the rebbes created some of the most enduring songs, not all chassidic tunes are home grown. I was intrigued to learn that many Chassidim saw it as a holy duty to transform secular tunes for sacred purposes. However, attempts by Ger and Kotzk Chassidim to make use of the melodies of Schubert, Chopin and Verdi met limited success.

At the Collection of Chabad Niggunim [http://www.utexas.edu/students/cjso/Chabad/audio/niggun.html], you can listen to everything from Darkecha Elokainu (from the Yom Kippur davening) to several tunes with no lyrics (except for ah-ya-ya-ya-eye-eye-eye) and a great deal of passion. Over at Music of Modzitz [http://www.bayside.net/users/hershtaub/music.htm], you'll hear tunes like the Modzitzer Waltz, Hamavdil and Mizmor L'David. And over at the Chassidic Niggunim Series, you can listen to Rabbi Chaim Dalfin not only sing some chassidic classics but also explain the songs' history and religious significance [http://www.613.org/speakers/dalfin.html].

Peninnah Schram is one of today's foremost Jewish storytellers. In The Nigun, she weaves story and music to tell the tale of Hayim. Hayim is given 100 rubles by his future father-in-law to buy cloth for a wedding suit. But he spends it on something much more important – music [http://www.storypower.com/hasidic/stories/nigun.html]. In an accompanying essay, Schram explains how through song, "one can attain salvation, get rid of evil and reach the ultimate communion with God.

"Thus the Chassidim treasure the human voice – the voice that can sing and tell stories."

Of course the influence of chassidic music has travelled much further than the rebbe's table. Andy Statman davens at a Modzitzer chassidic shul in Brooklyn. But he also swings in Manhattan. Statman is an Orthodox Jew who has married chassidic music with jazz in his new CD Between Heaven and Earth: Music of the Jewish Mystics. [http://www.soundprint.org/~soundprt/this_week/statman.html] You can listen to excerpts of Der Rebbe, Kazatski and several others at JewishMusic [http://www.jewishmusic.com/astrall.htm]. The importance of chassidic music continues. In future columns, I will look at the renaissance of klezmer music and at the remarkable impact of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

But I would like to conclude with Rabbi Carlebach's Niggun Shabbat Shuvah as sung by Cantor Lorel Zar-Kessler of Congregation Beth El in Sudbury, Mass. [http://bethelsudbury.org/prayer/nigdesc.htm].

The words are from the Haftorah reading of Shabbat Shuvah, the Shabbat between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, which falls in the 10 days of reflection, repentance and turning.

Rabbi Carlebach sings the words of the Prophet Hosea: "Take with you words, and return – turn to God."

Jewish Life

Diplomatically Speaking

Looking back on the past Jewish year

By JEHUDI KINAR

As we are entering the year 5759, we should take a moment to reflect on the past year's events. As you know, we celebrated the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel, and commemorative events were held with enthusiasm and gusto across Canada. The peace process has not yet culminated in a second redeployment, and from time to time we are reminded of this when we have to bury new victims of this dangerous situation.

I think that the request for reciprocity, as expressed by Israel's prime minister and by his government, so that the Palestinian Authority will keep its part of the agreement, is not too much to ask.

One cannot escape the feeling that for some people the term "reciprocity" seems to be somehow tainted when applied to relations between Israel and the Palestinians. But is only reasonable to expect that in any bilateral agreement, both sides have to abide by the text of the agreement. It is difficult, therefore, to understand why in this instance, Israel is expected to keep its part of the deal or even more, while the Palestinians are not similarly required to fulfil these demands. There should be equal expectations from and of each side.

In the economic field, Israel's inflation has been curbed and we expect it to be between four and five percent this year. This figure is quite astonishing if we remember the much higher figures just five years ago. The economic regression which hit the whole world also touched Israel. The Tel Aviv Stock Market suffered badly during the last few weeks. What is particularly disturbing is the increased unemployment which is nearing the ten percent mark. Although this may in part be explained by the fact that Israel absorbed more than one million immigrants in the last eight years, this excuse does not help those who have not found work. The government will have to emphasize its efforts in this field.

On the other hand, we must consider what can be done to rectify the problem of foreign workers in Israel. The number of foreign workers now exceeds the number of unemployed. Of course, we are aware of the fact that some of the unemployed Israelis do not want to take upon themselves the work done by the foreign workers. Nevertheless, if they want a change in their status, they will have to change their attitude towards what constitutes suitable employment. The Israeli government is currently working on solutions to this problem.

While pointing to the most urgent economic problems, we should not omit the many success stories of the past year. A number of high-tech firms have been sold to American companies for prices which in some cases exceed $250 million and in one case a half billion U.S. dollars. The foreign interest shown in the Israeli high-tech is striking, and industries in countries like Japan have posted permanent representatives in Israel to look for lucrative investments.

On the cultural stage as well, Israel enjoyed a successful year. Israeli theatres and performers were applauded in Europe and North America, and the Eurovision song festival award was awarded to an Israeli singer for a third time.

I wish all the readers of The CJN and the klal Yisrael, a Shanah Tovah, and a happy, healthy new year.

Moments Of Transcendence.* Inspirational Readings for Yom Kippur. Edited by Rabbi Dov Peretz Elkins (Jason Aronson Inc.).

The meaning and themes of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are inexhaustible. In these two volumes, the author has culled from a surprising variety of sources – readings, poems, prayers, insights and aphorisms about the Days of Awe.

• There is something in the world that the Bible regards as a symbol of God – not a temple or a tree, not a statue or a star. The one symbol of God is a person, every person. God Himself created man, in His image. Human life is holy, holier even than the scrolls of the Torah. Reverence for God is shown in our reverence for man. Treat yourselves as a symbol of God. What is necessary is not to have a symbol, but to be a symbol.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel

• The great Jewish humorist, Sam Levenson, in describing the Jewish American experience, once wrote, "My folks were immigrants and they fell under the spell of the American legend that the streets of America were paved with gold! When my father got here, though, he found out three things: First, he saw that the streets were not even paved, and last, but not least, he discovered that he was the one who was expected to do the paving." There are three precepts that the Jew must understand before beginning anything new... first, the dream of what ought to be; second, the reality of how it is; and last, but not least, what must be done to make life more livable for everyone. Perhaps that, above all, should be the Jewish watchword during this New Year.

• The Rabbi of Rymanov was asked, "Wherein lies the superiority of Yom Kippur, that it is called 'A Sabbath of Sabbaths?' Is not the weekly Sabbath also referred to as 'A Sabbath of Sabbaths unto the Lord' (Exodus 35:2)?" Replied the rabbi, "Read the Bible more carefully. Of the weekly Shabbat it says, 'A Sabbath of Sabbaths unto the Lord,' but of Yom Kippur it is written 'A Sabbath of Sabbaths unto you' (Leviticus 23:32)." This day is the most sacred in our calendar because it focuses attention on the individual, on the need of personal improvement and for ultimate human betterment.

• Modern Jewish thinkers have given their interpretations of the shofar. One of the finest of these is Milton Steinberg's exposition that the shofar is a call to man to hear the sound of weeping humanity, to feel what the poet calls the Weltschmerz, the unspeakable pain of the world, and to resolve to do battle against all those forces working for man's oppression and subjugation, to the end that the day might come when the tear is wiped from every cheek and the sigh from every lip.

Rabbi Louis Jacobs

• At this season, when we pray for life, it is sobering to realize how often we misjudge the purpose and meaning of life itself.

We bypass the lasting things for the latest things. We sacrifice health for wealth and then try in vain to undo a bad deal. We try to keep up to the minute, and our interests become momentary. We have accelerated our speed of travel and lost our sense of direction. We have confused the Pursuit of Happiness with running after pleasure. We have so many beautiful houses and an unprecedented number of broken homes. We have added knowledge, but we have not increased wisdom. We have overfed our bodies, and at the same time, starved our souls. We have become preoccupied with making a living and have paid little attention to making a life.

3 Canadians join JDC programs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three young Canadians have embarked on year-long stints in international Jewish communal service with the New York-based American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Inc. (JDC).

Adina Lakser of Winnipeg and Jill Borodin of Toronto are serving in India and Romania respectively, as part of the JDC Jewish Service Corps (JSC). Other countries that have had JSC volunteers include Morocco, Bulgaria, Poland, Italy and Tunisia.

Chaim Motzen, who was born in Israel and raised in Montreal, is currently at the JDC office in New York on the Ralph I. Goldman Fellowship in International Jewish Communal Service.

Adina Lakser

(The JDC is one of UIA Federations Canada's overseas beneficiary agencies, receiving approximately $400,000 annually.)

Lakser, a 22-year-old alumna of Winnipeg's Torah Academy, left at the end of August for Bombay. The Brandeis University graduate in comparative literature (English and Hebrew), has worked as a Hebrew school teacher, youth service director and youth activity leader for grades 6 to 8. Last summer she volunteered at a Jewish overnight camp in Hungary.

"I would really like to be a part of the [Indian Jewish] community," Lakser told The CJN by phone before leaving Canada. She is serving as a resource person to help the Bombay-area Jewish population with programming.

Jill Borodin

"Life is a little hectic here in India," Lakser wrote in a recent e-mail, "and everything is made more difficult by the fact that it is monsoon season and sometimes I think the whole city of Bombay will float away.

"The community, numbering just under 5,000, has been "wonderfully welcoming."

Lakser will soon begin teaching a class on Jewish literature and another on Parashat Hashavua. She has also spoken at some pre-High Holy Day seminars.

Borodin, 26, left for Romania after a summer working at Camp Ramah in the United States. A graduate of McGill University where she specialized in Middle Eastern and Jewish Studies, Borodin has completed four years of rabbinical school at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. She plans to complete her studies there after her year in Romania.

Borodin is based at the Federation of Romanian Jewish Communities in Bucharest and will spend about a third of her time travelling to Jewish communities in Transylvania.

Along with another volunteer and members of the local community, she is working on a myriad of programs aimed primarily at youth and young adults – among them Hebrew classes, a learners' minyan, a youth leadership conference, Jewish arts and crafts and cooking, basic Judaism, a Jewish parents' group and Shabbat and holiday programs.

Chaim Motzen

Romania's Jewish community, with a population of 14,000, is very well organized, especially in terms of social services, reports Borodin. There are a number of Jewish youth choirs and summer camps.

"I've always wanted to be able to work with the Jewish community overseas," she said.

Motzen, 24, began working at the JDC's New York office in early September. He expects to be sent abroad for his first assignment before the end of the year.

"This fellowship gives unbelievable opportunity to work with Jewish communities all over the world, and hopefully to contribute to them," he said.

Motzen has an undergraduate degree from Yeshiva University (YU) with a major in biology and a minor in art. He has also volunteered with the Jewish community in the former Soviet Union.

The son of Cantor Yaacov Motzen, he attended YU's rabbinical school and hopes to make a career of working with the Jewish community. "I don't think I could find something better to do with one year."

Community Matters

Reflections...

Repentance and Responsibility

By Rabbi Moshe Shulman

The following excerpt is from a recent sermon by Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on the Torah portion Ki Tavo. Rabbi Shulman's thoughts are the first in a series of rabbinical contributions to Community Matters.

In this season of Repentance, when we think of viduy we think of confession. We think of admitting our shortcomings and our sins before G-d. But the word viduy itself doesn't always mean that. Viduy means acknowledgement, and sometimes that acknowledgement is not of our failures but of our successes; not of our transgressions but of our sincere and steadfast commitment to G-d and to Torah! That's precisely the type of viduy we read about this morning.

The Torah says that when you have finished tithing all the produce in the third year, shenat ha'ma'aser, you shall come before G-d and make the following Viduy Ma'aser declaration:

Rabbi Moshe Shulman

"I have [acted] according to whatever commandments You have commanded me. Lo Avarti mi'mitzvotecha ve'lo shachachti - I have not transgressed Your commandments, and I have not forgotten. Hashkifa mime'on Kodshecha min hashamayim - Now gaze down from Your holy abode, from the heavens. Uvarech et amcha Yisrael - and bless Your people Israel, and the ground that You gave us, as You swore to our forefathers, a Land flowing with milk and honey..." (Deut. 26:13-15)...

We know there are three separate tithes given over three years:

- Ma'aser Rishon - given to the Levites - in all three years.
- Ma'aser Sheni - eaten by the owners themselves, but only in Jerusalem - in years 1 & 2.
- Ma'aser Oni - a tithe given to the poor - in year 3.

But the Torah says: "When you complete the tithing in the third year, shenat ha'ma'ser - the year of the tithe!".... Were the other years not years of tithes? Why is only the third year called Shenat hama'aser?

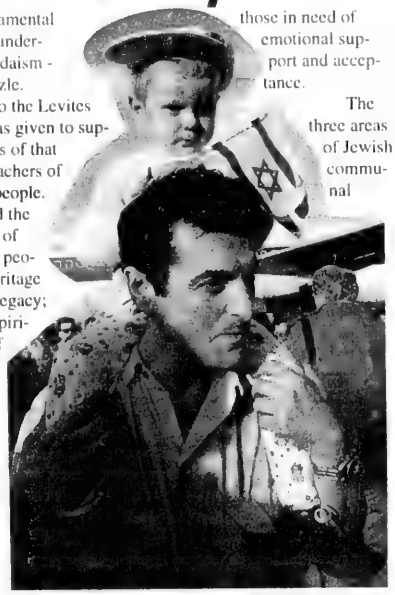
The 9th century scholar/philosopher R. Sa'adya Gaon explains this cryptically by saying: "Shenat gemar hama'srot - the year in which the tithes are completed." I believe this to mean the year of the coming together of all the Ma'asrot to complete one unified picture of Jewish communal responsibility. Each of these tithes expresses a different fundamental aspect of our understanding of Judaism - 1/3 of the puzzle.



The tithe to the Levites and Priests was given to support the efforts of that tribe as the teachers of Torah to our people. They assumed the responsibility of educating our people in their heritage and spiritual legacy; of being the spiritual leaders of our people. "For the lips of the priest shall guard the law, and Torah shall be sought from their mouths." (Michah 3). Ma'aser Rishon was a tithe for the support of Jewish education amongst our people.

Ma'aser Sheni was a tithe brought to Jerusalem and eaten there. Its purpose was to instill in our people an acute awareness of the centrality and pivotal importance that Israel and Jerusalem play in the life of our people.

Finally, Ma'aser Oni, the tithe given to the poor, was an expression of support and help, not only to the poor and less fortunate, but for the "stranger," often alone, and oppressed; "the orphan and the widow" and all those in need of emotional support and acceptance.

The three areas of Jewish communal responsibility represented by these three tithes - Jewish education, Israel and Jerusalem, and the needy amongst our people - unite together to give us Shenat Hama'aser - The year of the tithe.

In the last few weeks, this community has embarked on its annual UJA Federation campaign, with an ambitious new target of raising $50 million annually by 2001.

They have heightened the target by $13 million because they want to increase funds to Jewish day schools, and to programs of Jewish identity; to help strengthen Jewish commitment and Torah education.

They have lifted the target in order to increase funds to help speed up the rescue of Jews from poverty, anti-Semitism and fear in the countries of the former Soviet Union; to help bring Jewish immigrants to Israel, and to help build Israel as the strong central force in Jewish history that it is, and must remain.

They have raised their target because they want to increase funds to assist the poor with food, housing and child-care; to provide more counseling and crisis intervention for victims of family violence and their children; to help the frail and elderly; the sick and needy.

UJA Federation has specifically earmarked these three areas because they recognize that, together, they encompass the totality of our responsibilities as Jews:

- Responsibility to G-d and to Torah, to Jewish education, and to Jewish identity - Ma'aser Rishon.
- Responsibility to Israel, to our history, and to our future - Ma'aser Sheni.
- And responsibility to our Jewish needy all over the world - Ma'aser Oni.

Lo avarti mi'mitzvotech ve'lo shachachti - I have not transgressed, nor have I forgotten. Shama'ati be'kol Hashem Elokai, asiti kechol asher tzivitani - I have hearkened unto the voice of Hashem, my G-d.

Voices From the Heart

A Magical Moment...

The following is an edited excerpt, the second in a series, from Voices from the Heart: A Community Celebrates 50 Years of Israel, edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, published by McClelland & Stewart inc. The book, a collection of personal reflections by Canadians about their experiences in Israel, was produced as part of Toronto's Israel at 50 celebrations.

By George Cohon

In the final stages of the Yom Kippur War, I was on a bus with a group of about twenty other civilians heading from the Suez back to an Israeli airfield, where the plan was for us to catch a flight to Tel Aviv. Suddenly we went over a big rock in the dirt road. The bus cracked down hard, and oil was going everywhere. We, on the other hand, were going nowhere.

So there we sat with armies all around us, helicopters and transports flying overhead. Earlier that day we had stood by the Suez Canal and looked across its waters toward smouldering Egyptian tanks that had been abandoned during the battle of China Field. It had been an unforgettable sight.

We were rescued eventually by Israeli soldiers and put on a military transport plane. And on that plane an extraordinary thing happened.... Every soldier sat on the floor with his legs around the man in front of him. They were all tired and dusty and battle-weary. We, the civilians, sat among them.

The war had been a stunning victory for Israel, and now, on the Hercules, everyone was talking - about the war, about going home, about friends and family. But for a second there was a lull in the hubbub, so that one voice - that of a young soldier at the front of the plane - stood out from the rest. Then there was a shout from an older man, also a soldier, from the rear: "Josie!"

The older soldier and Josie were father and son - neither had known the other was on the plane. In fact, neither had known the other was even alive until that moment. But there was no way they could move, for there wasn't an inch of space. So the soldiers at the back hoisted the father over their shoulders, and the shoulders at the front did the same with the son. It was a magical moment.

- excerpted from To Russia with Fries (Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1997).

SUPER SUNDAY

TOPS $2 MILLION

Twelve hours plus over 600 volunteers equal $2.1 million. That's how things added up on what turned out to be a record UJA Federation Super Sunday, September 13. Phones were scarce at UJA Federation's largest one- day fundraising telethon - but volunteers weren't. An unprecedented number of Super Sunday campaigners called thousands of community members last week, raising close to $ 3 million during Super Week telethons, September 14 – 17, moving UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty closer to its goal of $50 million by 2001. Many community groups, schools and organizations, participated in the telethons, which will continue until the campaign winds down in December. Maura Cooperberg and Leo Goldhar co-chaired this year's Super Sunday and Super Week activities.

The following snapshots, taken by Stephen Epstein, highlight the record-breaking week and the volunteers who made it happen.

Economics conference set in honor of retiring professor

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A conference honoring professor emeritus Samuel Hollander, a specialist in classical economics who recently retired from the University of Toronto (U of T) economics department, will take place Sept. 27 and 28.

Economists from Europe, New Zealand and Japan, as well as the United States and Canada, will attend the conference, whose theme is Reflecting on the Canon.

Speakers at the conference, to be held at U of T., will include international scholars from universities around the world.

In his autobiography titled, It's An Ill Wind...: A Memoir, Hollander reflects on his life, particularly his religious thoughts and beliefs. An observant Jew, he candidly tells of his early years and his academic activities.

Hollander's memoir tells of the mild anti-Semitism he faced in his education, the prejudice shown against him as an observant Jew by other Jews, and the scholars who influenced his thinking.

Describing himself as a workaholic and an insomniac, Hollander says, "The Sabbath day has protected me from some of the effects of my workaholism – and my insomnia has afflicted me on all nights except Friday."

Hollander, who was elected to the Royal Society of Canada in 1976, has received academic honors, awards and research funding.

Hollander's specialty is the history of economic thought, but his doctoral dissertation was on technological changes in the Dupont rayon industry. "I believe that this brief but intensive expedition into the real world of industry, and my encounter with entrepreneurs, served me well in my later academic endeavors," he says.

"His research has had an immense impact on the profession of economics," says Prof. Sandra Peart, a former graduate student of Hollander's and a co-organizer of the conference.

"His greatest contribution has been to younger economists and historians of economic thought, who have come from around the world to study with him. No historian of economics in this century has attracted as many disciples or [caused] as much controversy as Sam," says Peart.

Hollander was born in London, England. He graduated from the University of London and received his PhD at Princeton University. He came to Canada in 1963 as assistant professor in the department of political economy at U of T and in 1984, he was named a university professor, one of only 20 to have attained this highest academic rank. He became a professor emeritus this year. He has been a guest lecturer at universities throughout the world.

A banquet to honor Hollander will be held on Sunday evening, Sept. 27.

Tory fundraising dinner planned for Yom Kippur

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Ontario's Tories say the scheduling of a big fundraising dinner for Yom Kippur was not intended to slight Jews.

"We work with a limited number of days," said Don Weiss, director of the provincial Progressive Conservative party's Ontario Fund, which is organizing next Wednesday's dinner. "That day is on."

Weiss said the choice of Sept. 30 "was not directed at the Jewish community." He said the annual dinner is aimed at members of the building trades and draws a large number of Italian supports.

Permier Mike Harris and some 1,100 party supporters are expected to attend the dinner in Concord, where each plate will cost $300 or $400, Weiss said.

He said he had "nothing to add" to previously quoted statements, in which he said "no disrespect was ever intended" to members of the Jewish community.

But for Vaughan Ward 5 councillor Susan Kadis, the choice of Yom Kippur is insulting.

"They had so many days to choose from," Kadis said. "They don't need to choose the holiest day on the Jewish calendar."

She noted that Vaughan, where the dinner will take place, is home to a high concentration of Jewish residents – and voters.

"Not a lot of thought went into this. A little consideration would have avoided it."

She said this is "another example of this government's insensitivity."

Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, played down the matter.

"The PC party is a private organization that has the right to target projects where and when it chooses," he said. "We have no issue here."

STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

Israel's remarkable 50 year journey has captured the hearts and imagination of Jews around the world. Against all odds, persecution has been transformed into triumph and dreams have become reality. No nation has achieved so much in so little time.

Now, Israel along with her partners in the Diaspora, must face the challenge of the next fifty years - the challenge of the 21st century.

New highways, rail links, ports and hydro-electric systems are the building blocks to Israel's continued success. Israel Bonds will continue to provide the working capital for these and many other infrastructure projects.

There can be no doubt that a strong Israel will, as it has since 1948, ensure the strength of the Jewish people over the next fifty years.

Israel Bonds are a means of securing our future as a family, as a people, as a nation.

JCS aiming to boost presence in schools

CJN Staff

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto is aiming to raise $1 million in order to increase its presence in schools across the city, its executive director said recently at the agency's first annual meeting.

Zac Kaye said that they are about to sign a lease with University of Toronto, and will then begin to seek funding in order to build a facility at the the corner of Harbord and Huron streets. "Without a significant presence in such a large university, and without shouting Jewish pride, then we are not doing our job," he said.

As well, the agency plans to spend money refurbishing its facility at York University and increase its programs at community colleges. "Jewish students today do not just come to us; we have to go to them and respond to their diverse needs. Pluralism is something that we practise. Students relate to us in that we are open and welcoming and do not impose our views."

Post-secondary schools across the city have a large number of Jewish students, said Kaye, "and we need to respond to those numbers. There are also many commuter students [whose needs are different from those who live on campus.] We have to create a dual track, working on campus and also building strong city-wide programs.We have to create a smorgasbord of opportunities by putting out a broad table from which students can dip."

Kaye said that reaching out to the many unconnected students is a mammoth task. "If we're serious, then we must engage synagogues and other institutions in this work in order to ensure that young people have a stake in this community.

"If we do not do this, the consequences will be dire. Intermarriage rates are increasing and people are becoming more unaffiliated. We must respond in a myriad of ways. Young adults deserve the best programs possible, and campuses must be seen as a priority."

Jack Zarek, who was named president of the agency at the meeting, said that some of the highlights of the past year include the Jewish Campus Arts Festival, which resulted in a grant from the Zukerman Foundation, and the launching of a student discount card. "Our goal is to raise money to hire more staff who will reach more students, especially those who are debating about Judaism."

New group fights for survivors' compensation

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two local women have formed an organization to fight for compensation for Canadian Holocaust survivors who have fallen through the cracks.

Klara Belkin and Shiela Smith were spurred into action when they heard a speech made by Edgar Bronfman at a Canadian Club luncheon in March 1997. "We heard it on the radio," says Belkin's daughter Lisa. "Mr. Bronfman vowed to see to it personally that every Holocaust survivor, no matter how rich or poor, received restitution."

Belkin, a survivor of Bergen Belsen, wrote to Bronfman welcoming his offer of help. She told him that her inquiries to other restitution organizations indicated that she would have to be "a beggar or on welfare to be eligible for restitution despite the fact that I am a survivor.

"It is absurd that after 53 years since the Holocaust ended, some survivors are still having great difficulty receiving restitution, even when there are funds set up for this.

"These funds were set up for all survivors who lived through the unimagineable. My question is, where is all the money going? It seems strange to me that most of the survivors I know have not been successful in getting restitution."

In a follow-up phone call to the World Jewish Congress (WJC) office, Belkin was told by Elan Steinberg, WJC executive director, that "Mr. Bronfman does not respond to such questions."

She then wrote a letter to the editor of Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News which attracted the attention of Smith, who was in Israel last winter contacting Holocaust restitution organizations.

"We had a talk with United Restitution Organization (URO). We were told that [my husband Walter] isn't eligible for compensation because he earns more than $16,000 a year. They only deal in hardship cases."

Smith and Belkin are looking for answers but they don't know where to turn. "We are being denied on the flimsiest of technicalities," says Lisa Belkin. "I wrote to Moshe Ronen at the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). An official called back to say the CJC has nothing to do with URO other than providing office space."

Smith says that URO officials virtually called her a liar when she said that her husband wasn't aware until 1957 that restitution was available.

"We know of several other survivors in Winnipeg who have never received any compensation," Lisa Belkin says. "We suspect there are a lot more across the country. Other countries have set up restitution funds for Holocaust survivors. Not so in Canada. We are being victimized by our own organizations."

Smith and Belkin ran an ad in The Canadian Jewish News on Sept. 3, which is already eliciting responses.

"Jewish organizations in Canada should be doing everything they can to contact the few survivors left," says Smith. "Why should we still have to be fighting for compensation 53 years later?

"My husband survived the Warsaw Ghetto," says Smith. "He lost part of a leg. He was too busy in those years struggling to survive in Canada. He doesn't have any fight left in him now. I have to fight for him. Lots of money was distributed to Holocaust survivors in the 1970s and 1980s. Neither Klara nor my husband were ever sought out or contacted."

Enrolment drops 10 percent in Winnipeg Jewish school

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's (WBJE) Gray Academy has had a 10 percent drop in enrolment in its second year at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Student numbers have declined from 850 last year to 760 this fall.

The Gray Academy is divided into three levels: The Simkin Early Years program (junior kindergarten through Grade 4); Shore Middle Years School (grades 5-8); and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate.

WBJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky says that the decline is uniform throughout all grade levels, and that the lower junior kindergarten enrolment is due to changing demographics.

Some people feel that the drop in junior kindergarten registration may be due to north Winnipeg parents keeping their kids north for junior kindergarten, and to the opening of a religiously oriented ·nior kindergarten in the south end where the Gray Academy is located.

In the higher grades, the WBJE is competing with the University of Winnipeg which has added a Grade 10 program, and St. John's Ravenscourt, a private school, which is welcoming girls at the Grade 7 level for the first time this year.

"Our enrolment was much higher than anticipated last year," Cipilinsky says. "There were a lot of growing pains. Some people decided that this wasn't for them. Maybe it is one of those cycles. We hope it will pick up again next year."

The two public school elementary Hebrew bilingual programs registered little change in their enrolments this year. Brock-Corydon in south Winnipeg has 175 students registered – almost the same number as the last two years, and the north Winnipeg program at Margaret Park School has a registration of 109 this year, an increase of five over last year, and about the same as were enrolled two years ago.

Israeli doctor helps identify Swissair crash victims

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Dr. Jay Levinson has spent a very difficult week in Halifax.

Levinson, who works with the Israel police division of identification and forensic science, was called on to assist in identifying Jewish victims of the Swissair Flight 111 disaster.

Twenty Jewish victims were identified as of mid-September, a figure compiled from family identification of persons who took the flight and from names that appeared to be Jewish.

While most of the 229 victims were obliterated in the crash off Peggy's Cove near Halifax, there were some small parts of bodies that have led to identification.

"We called all families involved who declared themselves Jewish or [who might be Jewish] from the names, and asked the questions," said Levinson. "For the first time, we're going to have to use DNA as a primary basis of identification, though."

He said analysing DNA is a relatively new procedure, developed in the mid-1980s. It was used in the TWA crash off New York, where all the bodies were recovered and most were essentially intact. Recovery problems there were not as extensive as here, he said.

The Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) offered its services to assist families within hours of the Sept. 2 crash, calling rabbinical advisors worldwide for procedural advice.

"We talked with rabbis all over the world, spoke with Rabbi Donner in London; Rabbi Moshe Tendler in New York, who is a professor of microbiology and understands both Jewish law and DNA; Rabbi Shlomo Adler in Manchester, England; and Rabbi Gedaliah Schwartz, of Chicago, head of the beit din of the Rabbincal Council of America. We sought their help in identifying Jewish bodies and the proper procedures to follow in burial," said Victor Goldberg, president of the AJC.

Levinson has attended air disasters at Lockerbie, Amsterdam, Strasbourg, Katmandu, Nigeria and many within Israel.

A Newark, N.J. native, he holds three degrees from New York University including a doctorate in Mideastern studies. He immigrated to Israel in 1985 after serving 10 years with the Central Intelligence Agency.

In Halifax, Levinson worked closely with Dr. John Butt, Nova Scotia's chief medical examiner. "I spoke to him for about 20 minutes from Israel before I came here," he said, "and he welcomed me with open arms. When I arrived, he asked me to brief his staff on Jewish requirements so they would understand our needs. But I also helped identify bodies other than those of Jewish victims.

"It wasn't my place to tell them what to do, but to tell them what's been done through my experience and to apply that to their situation."

Levinson emphasized he has the advantage of being a policeman "so I understand what the police want. And I'm a religious Jew who knows Jewish requirements."

He said working with families of victims created relatively few problems. "Some were extremely cooperative in supplying dental records, DNA samples, fingerprints, X-rays and even details on unique scars. Others held back and unfortunately, their relatives may never be identified. Basically, I want to make sure identifications are acceptable by Jewish law, which in effect means there are no [identification] mistakes."

Some passports found

Some passports were found, clearly identifying people on the plane, said Levinson.

He said when nothing is found of the victim, as will be the case with many because of the impact of this crash, it must be proven positively that the person was on the plane.

"We need personal testimony from someone who saw the person enter the plane. We have a letter from Butt that no one survived the crash. When the time comes, that letter can be brought to a Jewish court. If a question comes up later, they will have that certification."

He said a body is not necessary to prevent a woman from becoming an agunah. It must be proven the husband is dead, but if there is no body, proof he went on the plane is sufficient.

Levinson stressed the caring nature of the Halifax Jewish community. "In many other Jewish communities, the leaders were friendly. But here all the people offered to help."

Goldberg added, "Our Jewish community rallied together. We worked as one."

Levinson admitted the job is difficult emotionally. "One of the hardest sights was in the property room where I saw dolls, toys, kids' shoes. That was harder for me than seeing body parts. It rips out your heart that these little children had such short lives."

Yet, he said, he gets the most strength from doing a mitzvah.

"There is satisfaction that I've helped people, by speeding the process even by five minutes, that a family can have identification and suffer for five minutes less."

But his main thrust, he said, was not to force anyone to do anything, but to make sure things were done acceptably by Jewish law.

Kol Nidre in Auschwitz

[Cont'd. from pg. 1]

The little red-headed girl was amazed that anyone still wanted to pray in Auschwitz. "You crazy Hungarian Jews," she exclaimed. "You still believe in this? You still want to do this?"

Well, we did.

So, we got one candle, and one siddur. We were about 800 women jam-packed in one barrack. Everybody was there: the atheists, the believers, the Orthodox women without their sheitls, because, of course, we were all bald; women of every description and of every background. We all were there whether we believed or not.

Someone lit the candle.

The kapos only gave us 10 minutes because they were afraid the SS might come in.

Each of the kapos guarded an entrance to the barracks to watch out for the SS.

And then – I can still see this scene – a woman sitting with the candle started to read Kol Nidre.

All of this happened in the place where we felt it was appropriate that instead of our asking forgiveness from God, God should be asking for forgiveness from us.

And yet, everybody wanted to gather around the woman with the candle near the siddur.

She recited Kol Nidre very, very slowly, so that we could all repeat the words if we wanted to. But we didn't.

The 800 women did nothing but cry. Our prayer was the sound of 800 women crying in unison.

And yet it gave solace to everybody. Remembering Yom Kippur was somehow a reminder of people's homes, because as you know, Yom Kippur was observed even in the most non-practising homes.

Something happened to the 800 women. It was almost as if our hearts burst. I never heard so much loud crying out of 800 women.

Even though no one believed the prayer would change our situation, that God would suddenly intervene, it released something in us.

It helped us to feel better. Joining in something that reminded us of normal life alleviated our misery, even for the littlest while, in some unexplainable way.

Even today, every time I go to Kol Nidre, I think of that Kol Nidre in Auschwitz. I can't shake it. That's the Kol Nidre that I always remember.

Oberlander downplays role in killing squad

BY PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

KITCHENER, Ont. — A former interpreter in a Nazi killing squad claims his role in the unit consisted mainly of polishing officers' boots, scrounging for food, obtaining supplies and making notes of Soviet radio broadcasts.

Helmut Oberlander said he was unwillingly "taken away into the German forces" in February or March 1942 following a visit to his family home by a police officer who was recruiting ethnic Germans (Volksdeutsch) living in German-occupied Soviet territory.

Oberlander said he was fluent in German and Russian, and that he served as an interpreter for Einsatzkommando 10A – but he denied outright that he was ever involved, in the interrogation of prisoners or the execution of civilians. Instead, he said he was involved in mundane tasks necessary for the unit's daily functioning. Later, he acknowledged that at some point in his career, he was given a pistol and a submachine-gun, and that he participated in anti-partisan raids.

Although the unit was part of the SD (the security arm of the SS), he denied he was a member of either organization. Oberlander also denied that he misled or lied to Canadian immigration officials about his wartime activities. He said he was never asked to describe what he did during the war – although that was a standard question asked of everyone immigrating to Canada.

Oberlander, a 74-year-old retired developer, is facing loss of citizenship and deportation for allegedly lying about his role in Einsatzkommando 10A, a killing squad that followed the German army into the southern Soviet Union and murdered tens of thousands of Jews and communists.

Oberlander's testimony is being tested in cross-examination by Justice Department lawyer Peter Vita, but even before he faced tough questioning, his story contained numerous gaps and claims that stretched belief:

• Oberlander said he spent about two years in the unit before it was merged with other forces but he claimed he didn't learn it was called Einsatzkommando 10A until 1970 when he was called upon to provide an affidavit in a West German war crimes trial;

• He said he considered himself an interpreter who worked for the SD. The SD's task was "to dismantle the Stalin regime, administer the territory occupied by German forces and administer justice, or something," he said.

In fact, the SD was given the primary task early in the war for the destruction of the Jews;

• Oberlander claimed he joined the unit involuntarily, though an expert witness testified the unit was staffed with volunteers;

• Oberlander said he believed that if he disobeyed orders, he would be shot. But the same witness testified that did not take place;

In cross-examination, Oberlander testified that German forces "liberated" the ethnic Germans in his hometown of Halbstadt, who had been gathered for almost two weeks in a field alongside a railway station, waiting to be deported to Siberia. A few days later, a regulation appeared ordering Germans to register themselves or be shot, Oberlander testified.

That statement prompted Vita to ask why German forces would threaten to shoot Germans when they claimed they were in the Soviet Union to protect the Volksdeutsch?

"It doesn't sound right... but that's the way it was," Oberlander responded.

Vita also questioned Oberlander's claim that he was forced to join Einsatzkommando 10A. Vita pointed out that in October 1941, Oberlander volunteered to help the newly arrived German SS register Volksdeutsch in Halbstadt, and that a German police officer showed up at his home later to recruit him into the unit. Afterwards, SD and SS men drove him and other recruits for four to five hours to a camp where he was put to work cleaning boots and clothes.

Didn't they have locals for that? Vita asked.

They did, Oberlander acknowledged, but "they needed an interpreter to tell them what to do," he said.

Oberlander's cross-examination continued as The CJN went to press.

Nazi collaborator applies for status as a refugee

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto man linked to Nazi war crimes has applied for refugee status, putting into abeyance a deportation order against him.

Wasily Bogutin was given a conditional deportation order by an Immigration adjudicator after his lawyers announced they would be making a refugee claim on his behalf.

The move was condemned as a stalling tactic by Canadian Jewish Congress. "It is an absurd abuse of the process and a travesty in that many Jews fleeing the Nazis more than 50 years ago were denied entry into Canada," said Moshe Ronen, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Bogutin, 89, will be ordered deported if the refugee claim is rejected by the refugee board. Last February, Federal Court Judge William McKeown found that Bogutin was a member of a Ukrainian auxiliary police force that collaborated with German forces and was personally and directly involved in the roundup of young people for forced labor in Germany. The court also found that Bogutin lied about his wartime activities to Canadian authorities.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the department is considering whether to intervene to oppose Bogutin's refugee claim. Canada's Immigration Act was amended in the late 1980s to exclude as refugees people suspected of involvement in war crimes, he said.

If he is deported, Bogutin will become one of only a handful of Nazi war criminals forced to leave the country.

Dershowitz helps launch Vancouver CJA campaign

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Judaism today faces serious challenges said Harvard University professor Alan Dershowitz.

With falling birth rates and more intermarriage and assimilation, he told the audience he was not sure whether Judaism in its present form can survive. He was speaking at the opening of Greater Vancouver's 1998 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign at Temple Sholom.

"It has been predicted that five generations from now, most Jews in the United States will be Haredim and Chassidim," Dershowitz said.

Such a situation could result, he said, if religious Jews keep multiplying, and the number of secular Jews keeps falling. "In 1936, Jews constituted four percent of the population of the United States. Today, it is just two percent.

"We're full of secular learning, but for most of us, Jewish learning ends at the bar or bat mitzvah. We must persuade our young people of the importance of learning Jewish traditions and culture."

On a positive note Dershowitz said there is much less anti-Semitism today than at any time in the past. "Anti-Semitism no longer comes from the Roman Catholic Church, the government, universities, major corporations or the United Nations, he said. "It's not that there isn't anti-Semitism, but today it comes from the bottom of society, not the top."

He said that the emergence of women as "equal partners" in the Jewish community is "the best thing that's happened in Judaism in 2,000 years."

Judaism, he said, needs to develop new attitudes in order to deal with the changes of the "post-persecution era. The Jewish religion has never been a static religion. It has always been a religion of change. It's part of our tradition."

Dershowitz said Jewish divorce laws need to be made more liberal. "Jewish women shouldn't be made to live in chains because their spouses refuse to give them a divorce."

Judaism faces serious challenges

He added that non-Jewish spouses need to be encouraged to convert to Judaism.

"Judaism has always been diverse and full of division," he said. "Every Jew thinks he or she knows what every other Jew should think and feel – and that everyone else is wrong.

"Jews need to stick together and support their local community agencies and Israel. Don't deprive your institutions of what they're entitled to just because you may be angry about a policy of the Israeli government. If you disagree, you should double your contribution."

CJA campaign chair Sondi Ritter said, "Vancouver is the fastest growing Jewish community in Canada, with rapidly expanding needs to meet this growth. If we expect our burgeoning community to sustain a vital Jewish life, we must support it. However, we cannot meet the extraordinary needs at home at the expense of those in Israel. We have no choice but to do both."

Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver president Dr. Jonathan Berkowitz called the 1998 campaign kickoff "a time for togetherness and unity" and a "celebration of the year ending and the year about to begin."

Last year's CJA campaign raised just over $4 million.

CJA walk held in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The organizers were not expecting large numbers of people out for the Combined Jewish Appeal's (CJA) first Walk for Israel, but it was nevertheless a moderate success.

"We thought our expectations were reasonable," says Elliott Katz, co-chair of the organizing committee for the walk, which was held on Aug. 30 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"It was the last weekend of the summer and the day before school started. Our principal goal was to get the idea out before the public. We were pleased with the turnout that we did get, and with the results."

The idea to hold the Walk for Israel was proposed last spring by CJA executive director Gerry Koffman who was familiar with similar walks that are held annually in Ottawa and Vancouver.

"We scheduled it for Aug. 30 because we wanted to coordinate it with Israel's 50th anniversary," Katz explains. "We had a good number of volunteers and very few glitches. We will schedule the second walkathon for next May, which is a better time for families."

The walkathon and sale of T-shirts did raise about $1,500 for the Travel Israel program. The funds will be used to provide scholarships for Winnipeg Jewish students who want to study in Israel.

Ottawa marks end of an era as old JCC closes

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Amidst all the excitement and planning around the community's upcoming move to a new JCC facility, it seemed fitting to have some sort of event in the old centre to mark the end of an era.

About six months ago, co-chairs Phyllis Leith and Carolyn Katz came up with the idea to hold an old-fashioned Sunday afternoon dance like the ones they remember so fondly from their teenage years.

"Everyone we mentioned it to wanted to be on the committee," says Katz. "It seemed everyone we spoke to was so excited about it. Some even came in from Montreal to be at our meetings."

Beth Shalom Synagogue, which shared the building with the JCC, agreed to co-sponsor the dance, and plans moved along. Door prizes were donated, a band and DJ were booked, refreshments were ordered and advertisements placed.

On Sept. 6, the doors opened one last time to the sounds of the '50s and '60s provided by Bruce and the Burgers. A crowd of nostalgic Ottawans and former Ottawans streamed into the auditorium to dance, mingle, reminisce and nosh on the familiar hot dogs and cokes from the good old days.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, returned to his roots for the event.

"I started off here. This is where I cut my Jewish teeth," he recalled. "I started as a day camp counsellor, a cub leader, switchboard operator, then day camp director and program director...this building has so many memories."

Many of those attending the dance had fond memories of a romantic nature. Carolyn Katz met her husband Sid at one of the Sunday afternoon dances nearly 40 years ago. George Caplan met his wife, Rhoda at the JCC as well.

"I was playing basketball for the JCC league. My wife was working at the centre at the time and I asked her to go for coffee," Caplan said. They married and raised four daughters and are still involved with the JCC.

Heni Honigman came from Montreal to visit a cousin in Ottawa 44 years ago, went to a dance at the JCC and met her future husband, Lou, there.

Sue Bronsther met her husband, Phil, at an AZA dance at the JCC and they both kept coming back.

"It was a place to see and be seen, the only place for Jewish people to go. I have fabulous memories. Phil and I both worked here on Sunday Fundays, day camp and Brownies."

In their capacity as caterers for this event, Sue added with a chuckle, "back then we were eating the hot dogs; now we're making them."

In a Passing Over ceremony to mark the transition from the past to the future, JCC president Jeff Gould noted that "as time moves on, so do our community needs... We are saying goodbye today to a building, which for many years, has been a part of our lives."

Remembering the JCC's first director, the late Hy Hochberg, Gould said that "now, over 40 years later, Hy and Pauline's niece, Linda Hochberg Kerzner has taken over the reigns of the JCC." Pauline Hochberg and her family then symbolically presented a key to Linda.

On a lighter note, Kerzner was then given several gifts to take to her new office, including the original curtains from the teen lounge, an old chair, a mezuzah from the door of the old snack bar and a piece of plaster from the ceiling.

Halifax lawyer helps launch endowment fund for AJC

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Jack Prince apologized, but he shouldn't have.

His leadership has led to the formation of the The Legacy of Life, a bequest and endowment fund that will aid Atlantic Jewish Canadians for years to come.

"I was negligent in not establishing this fund decades ago," the veteran Halifax lawyer told 40 business and community leaders at a luncheon to introduce the concept. "The income...will enhance the quality of Jewish traditions regardless of the size of the community."

The fund will enable Atlantic Jewish Canadians to contribute, with tax credits and income development, to charitable organizations that will benefit smaller communities in the region.

Prince, co-chair of the Atlantic Jewish Council's (AJC) Bequest and Endowment Fund, welcomed Halifax-area accountants and lawyers and introduced them to accountant Robert Kleinman, executive director of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal and director of financial resource development for FEDERATION CJA. Kleinman spent a valuable hour outlining various endowment and bequest plans.

"Canadians are neophytes in planned giving compared to Americans who have developed so many products to meet the needs of donors," said Kleinman, who had 18 years' experience as a taxman with Ernst & Young prior to moving to the Montreal Foundation.

"Some Canadian Jewish centres, such as Toronto and Vancouver, have moved profitably into planned giving while others, like Calgary Edmonton and Halifax, are just starting," he said.

Kleinman presented the seminar with copies of the National Jewish Gift Planning Handbook, which he authored under the auspices of United Israel Appeal of Canada, the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada, FEDERATION CJA and the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal.

The 23-chapter volume, including appendices, deals with various types of bequests, such as life insurance, capital property, marketable securities, real estate, private company shares and art.

"As financial planners, there's a place for you to deal with your clients," he told the professionals. "If you can't bring them these ideas, not forcing them to do charity but showing them how, you're not giving them all the opportunities from a financial point of view.

"You also make charity happen, which is such a major part of Jewish life," he said. "Even if you charge your fees, you've done your part."

Jim Spatz, co-chair of the AJC's Bequest and Endowment Fund, said the fund has been underway for a few months, although it was only officially announced recently. He said the intent is to enhance Jewish life in Atlantic Canada.

Gifts totalling more than $250,000 were announced at the luncheon, including a $214,000 bequest from the estate of the late Rebecca Cohn.

"For a beginning, it's not a bad start," said Prince. "These gifts came unattached. There is no legal direction for use, but they will aid the poor Jewish people in the region."

Spatz, a medical doctor and real estate developer, was impressed with Kleinman's knowledge and ability to present it in lay terms. "He's an expert in the field and today, he was teaching experts new things."

Israel seals territories amid terror threats

By AMOS HAREL and SAMI SOCKOL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The IDF last Friday again placed a blanket closure on the territories until the end of Rosh Hashanah.

Israeli forces also remained on high alert because of warning signs of Hamas plans to abduct IDF soldiers and set off car bombs in a large Israeli city.

Tension, already running high since Israeli forces killed two Hamas military leaders, increased after a Jewish settler killed a 17-year-old Palestinian, identified as Iyad Rawhi Karabseh of Bitunia. The high school student was shot last week, apparently after he hurled stones at the settler's car.

Another youth, 15-year-old Aisa Jabarin, was injured in the shooting and was reported in serious condition.

The 35-year-old settler, whose identity was not made public, was not hurt in the incident. He reported the shooting to police only seven hours after it took place, after it had been reported in the media. He said he was confronted by a group of high school students who stoned his car as he drove to Jerusalem.

The IDF closure of the territories was to be in force until this Wednesday morning. During that time, no Palestinian workers would be allowed to go to jobs in Israel, with the exception of hospital workers, journalists and those travelling for "humanitarian reasons."

Some 17,000 workers and 3,000 businesspeople who had been gradually allowed into Israel last week would not be allowed back to work in Israel until after the holiday.

Defence authorities had not yet decided whether to impose a partial closure on the territories after the holiday.

The military would continue to remain on high alert throughout the holiday, bracing for a revenge attack by Hamas for the killing last week of Imad and Adel Awadallah, two leaders of the Palestinian group's military wing. Military sources said the warnings this time were "unprecedented in how widespread they were."

According to information in defence circles, the Hamas leadership had decided (as several of its leaders have openly vowed) to respond swiftly to the killing of the Awadallah brothers. Hamas planned to abduct several soldiers, perhaps simultaneously, and negotiate their release, under the assumption that such a situation would paralyze the country during the holiday season.

The IDF beefed up its watch on soldier hitchhiking posts, and its guard on organized transports for soldiers to reduce the risk of abductions. At the same time, soldiers in large numbers were given rules to follow for safe travel, particularly while hitchhiking. Military police have been carrying out a special operation to catch and court martial soldiers who do not follow the rules on safe travel.

Other warnings concerned the possibility that Hamas would try to drive a booby-trapped car into a major Israeli city or set off a car bomb in a settlement.

Last week, there were several incidents of Palestinians throwing stones at cars with Israeli licence plates in the West Bank. IDF sources said Fatah groups, as well as Hamas, were involved in the incidents.

Israel's population estimated at 5.9M

By MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, the population of Israel was estimated at 5,993,000 people, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced.

Of this number, 4,702,000 (79.4 percent) are Jews and 887,000 (14.8 percent) are Muslim. The rest belong to Christian, Druze or other communities.

The population increased by 133,000, or 2.2 percent, over the previous year, when the population increased by 2.6 percent.

The growth rate for last year was 1.7 percent, compared with two percent two years ago.

The Jewish population increased by 79,600 last year. Of that number, 68 percent was due to natural increase and the remainder to immigration. The contribution of immigration to population growth decreased slightly, from 37 percent two years ago to 31 percent last year.

Last year 58,000 immigrants arrived in Israel. Nearly 80 percent of the immigrants were from countries of the former Soviet Union.

Finish work, panel urged

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — One month after Switzerland's two largest banks agreed to pay $1.25 billion (US) to settle Holocaust-era claims, a panel conducting a sweeping audit of Swiss banks is coming under pressure to wrap up its work.

So far, auditors have discovered just over $50 million in dormant accounts belonging to Holocaust victims, but some sources say that amount could double by the time the process is complete.

Determining the value of those accounts is considered a critical part of the settlement reached last month between the banks and Holocaust survivors, which brings resolution to all Holocaust-era claims against Switzerland, with the exception of insurance claims.

As part of the settlement, the banks agreed to pay out all dormant accounts, deducting the amount from the $1.25 billion sum.

But some Swiss bank officials complain that the process is not moving quickly enough and that as it drags on, they continue to foot the bill.

Paul Volcker, the former U.S. Federal Reserve chair who is heading the panel adjudicating claims, has defended the exhaustive search, now in its second year, saying that as the panel continues its work, it undoubtedly will come up with more accounts.

"The process is complicated, and efforts are being made to speed it up," Volcker, who chairs the board of trustees of the Claims Resolution Foundation, said at an open meeting of the panel in New York last week.

Last year, the Volcker commission published the names of the holders of 5,570 bank accounts worth $51.6 million. Since then, 9,500 claims have been filed against 2,377 of those accounts. About 3,300 of those have been accepted as valid, and the rest have undergone an initial assessment and review by independent arbitrators.

The work of matching up claimants to accounts, undertaken by more than 200 auditors from international accounting firms, has been complicated by the fact that claims have been received from 27 countries in 20 languages.

The Oslo accord was a very flawed deal. We said so at the time and nothing has changed our view. We also said we would keep this agreement under the principle of the continuity of contracts, providing the other side keeps their part of it. This is why we have been insisting on reciprocity, why we have codified it, and why we now insist on seeing it implemented. When the Palestinians implement their obligations under the Oslo and Hebron accords, then we shall carry out our obligations.

We are not dealing with declarations any more, we want to see concrete fulfilment. If they carry out their commitments we will withdraw from additional territory.

CJN: If the Oslo Accord is, as you say, so flawed, why continue?

PM: Because we made a commitment to continue the process to its conclusion. The conclusion, by the way, is fulfilling the interim agreement and negotiating a final settlement. There is no road map in Oslo for the shape of a final settlement. The Oslo process and its stipulations lead you up to the final status negotiations, but leave the nature and outcome of these negotiations open-ended.

It is a big achievement for Israel to have been able to carry out its obligations and minimize the damage to the country. Obviously this is a far, far cry from what the Palestinians had expected to get from the previous government. The vast majority of Israelis want to have progress with the Palestinians based on the principles that we stand for – security and reciprocity – and minimizing the damage.

CJN: Dennis Ross was here again. How close are you to an agreement on the second stage?

PM: We were closer a month ago because we worked out discreet negotiations between Arafat's representatives and mine on the nature of the disengagement, including the concept of nature reserves. These are questions that are part of our security considerations. However the Palestinians backtracked on this agreement when it was very close to being finalized.

What has been holding up the agreement for some time now is not Israel; it is the persistent Palestinian refusal to honor their obligations under the Oslo agreements and carry out their promises to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorists and to jail terrorists – to stop hostile propaganda, annul the [PLO] covenant and extradite the murderers.

CJN: Do the Americans understand that?

PM: The Americans understand perfectly what is going on.

CJN: Last May in Washington you stated that you would not accept the concept of a double digit withdrawal. What made you change your mind?

PM: The Americans came up with a very interesting and creative bridging solution that essentially said they understood our concern with security problems with a more than 10 percent withdrawal. They came up with an idea for the additional three percent, of which Israel would retain the necessary conditions for security. We thought we had an understanding with the Palestinians to that effect, but it turns out that we were wrong because they backed away from it.

CJN: You are going to the United States later this month. What do you feel are the chances of success in signing an agreement?

PM: There is a 100 percent chance of success if the Palestinians have the political will to live up to their obligations. Zero if they don't. Between these two poles, take your pick.

Free market systems

CJN: Do close military ties between Israel and Turkey indicate the development of a strong regional bilateral force which might, if required, come to each other's assistance in the event of hostilities, for instance, in a conflict erupting between Syria and Israel or a conflict between Turkey and Greece. Is there not a danger that such ties could, in certain circumstances, become a danger to Israel? One scenario that I have in mind is a change in government in Turkey that could be fundamentalist-based and represent a serious threat to Israel's integrity.

PM: It is highly important that we have developed such a close relationship with a Muslim country. Turkey has the same concerns that we have – peace and stability in a volatile area. This is the nature of the relationship we have. It is not against anyone.

The other aspect is the burgeoning economic relationship that exceeds a billion dollars in annual trade. There is room for much joint venture. These are the two democracies in the Middle East. We both have free market systems.

Concerning your implication that we should be concerned that Turkey could be overtaken by fanatical forces, I agree with you. It is a concern that is shared in many other lands. I am sure that the international community would do well, and I direct my comments primarily to western Europe, to consider how important it is that such countries remain in the western orbit.

CJN: Are you concerned that Yevgeny Primakov has been appointed the new Russian prime minister, in view of the fact that he has a reputation as a well known Arabist?

PM: I am not concerned at all, because Mr Primakov was the foreign minister in the previous a ministration, shaping foreign polic I don't think foreign policy is abo to change.

It is our hope that we can co tinue to cement the bilateral ti between Russia and Israel. We ha an excellent relationship, except f one problem. We have been ver frank under Mr. Chernomyrdin an now I am being frank under Mr. Pr makov. I sent Mr. Primakov a co gratulatory note and I said that w expect him to take action against th leakage of Russian technology, bo ballistic and nuclear, to Iran an other such regimes.

I am not concerned with reputa tions; I am concerned with facts The facts are that Israel and Russi have a common interest in seein the development of peace in ou region. We also have an objectiv interest in preventing the threaten ing of peace to our two countries b irresponsible regimes who can hur ballistic missiles with equal profi ciency to Moscow and to Jerusalem

I hope, therefore, that we ca build on these common interest that we share.

With regard to the situation tha is developing in Russia, we obvi ously wish Russia well and hop that it will stabilize its economy an its society. We also view this as development that may result i massive aliyah, renewed large scal immigration of Jews from th former Soviet Union. Therefore, i our budget decision, we made on critical decision to propose pro grams for encouraging, not jus preparing, in case there is an aliyah

Programs to induce and promot aliyah will receive all the funding they require, budget constraints notwithstanding. The reason i simple. Having renewed Jewish sovereignty in the land of the Jews to bring in, to gather in the exiles That's what we are here for – t bring Jews to Eretz Yisrael.

CJN: What do you feel are th chances that within the next 1 months there will be new elections Are you prepared for elections?

PM: I don't think they will take place. I think the backbone of the coalition is now very strong. If we don't reach an agreement with the Palestinians, it is because they refuse to do their part. If we do secure Palestinian compliance and have an agreement, I don't believe the members of our coalition will bring down the government, for the simple reason that the redeployment would be a fait accompli. There would be far fewer concessions than a government of the left was pre pared to offer. I believe the coalition will hold nicely.

CJN: What is your resolution for the New Year?

PM: Number one, get some rest. Two, work hard for the well-being and the security of the peace for the people of Israel and the State of Israel. Three, that we should all achieve our private and collective goals, which I am sure we all share. Shanah Tovah.

Israel attempts to block PLO at United Nations

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will seek U.S. help in an effort to thwart a Palestinian plan to focus on the goal of statehood during the United Nations General Assembly session, said Yitzhak Leor, the Foreign Ministry's deputy-director general for international organizations.

The plan was outlined in a "priorities paper" recently released by the PLO in New York. "The Palestinian leadership has repeatedly announced its intention to reaffirm the declaration of independence of the State of Palestine in May 1999, the end of the five-year transitional period, in accordance with the existing Palestinian-Israeli agreements," the paper says.

The theme of statehood is expected to be stressed during Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's address to the General Assembly session. The UN secretariat has assured Israel that Arafat will not be treated as a head of state, but rather as head of the PLO.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will leave immediately after Rosh Hashanah for the UN, where he will address the General Assembly.

The Palestinian paper also reiterates themes such as seeking to win General Assembly approval to limit the acceptance of Israeli credentials during the annual formal presentation of credentials to the UN. They also seek to convene a conference of all the signatories to the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, which limits the authority of occupying powers.

While the status of the Palestinians at the UN was upgraded this year, they did not win acceptance on the credentials and Fourth Geneva Convention issues, due to efforts made by Israel with the United States and European countries.

Another issue of concern for Israel is the continuing European resistance to having Israel temporarily join the regional bloc Western Europe and Others Group (WEOG). Without being a member of a regional bloc, Israel remains the only country in the world that is not eligible to join the Security Council or other prestigious bodies. This lack of affiliation also blocks the nomination of Israelis to key UN positions.

"The Europeans tell us there is linkage between even a deliberation on WEOG and progress on peace," Leor said.

During his visit to the UN, Netanyahu will meet with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Indian Prime Minister Atal Vajpayee, and a host of foreign ministers. He is not scheduled to meet President Bill Clinton, since the president will not be at the UN when Netanyahu arrives. But the prime minister will be meeting with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Hopes for a three-way meeting in New York involving Clinton, Netanyahu and Arafat are tied to progress on the peace process. "If the situation remains as it is now, meaning that if Netanyahu shows no willingness to agree to the American initiative, then there will be no summit," said Arafat's spokesperson Nabil Abourdeneh.

Diaspora declining

By MICA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — More Jews could be living in Israel than in America in 10 years, according to a new World Jewish Congress study.

The annual pre-Rosh Hashanah survey of the world's 13.5 million Jews found that a growing rate of immigration to Israel, and high assimilation rates among Diaspora Jews will cause Israel's population of about 4.9 million Jews to exceed America's, which has been the world's highest since World War II.

At the same time, according to the report, the alarmingly high assimilation rates among Diaspora Jews could cause its population to fall by half in a generation.

The study, conducted during the past three months, also found that reported cases of anti-Semitism worldwide are down.

Avi Becker, director of the Jerusalem-based Institute of the World Jewish Congress, said that Jewish success was "good for Jews, but bad for Judaism" because it can lead to assimilation.

Jews are residing in more than 100 countries, but outside of Israel there has been no natural growth in most of these Jewish communities, the report said.

Becker attributed the shrinking population to a rising divorce rate, an increased number of Jews who prefer to remain single and low birth rates.

Jewish communities in Canada and Brazil are growing as immigration there rises. Germany also has a large Jewish immigrant community, mostly from the former Soviet Union. More than half of the 71,000 Jews in Germany are immigrants.

Rapid growth worldwide has taken place only in the fervently Orthodox communities, which have increased more than 20 percent during the past decade. Becker attributes this increase both to a high birth rate and the "return to religion" phenomenon in the West.

Some one million of the world's Jews are Orthodox, the report found.

America is home to more than 5.6 million Jews. French Jews make up the world's third-largest Jewish population with 600,000, according to the study.

More than 250 people and organizations contributed statistics to the study. Most of the data came from Jewish community records and academic studies.

TORONTO — After 17 years in business as purchasing director for the Oshawa Group, Judd Shemesh opted for a total career change.

Like other family members – his sister sculpts and paints, his mother and brother are clothing designers – he felt the need to express himself creatively.

He chose glass as his medium because, he says, it is "timeless."

What did he know about the artistry, the techniques, involved?

"You can learn anything you want in a library," he affirms, and his Glassique collection, which lights up his Thornhill studio/home testifies to that.

Born in Iraq, raised in Israel, living in Canada since 1973, Shemesh infuses his pieces with distinctive pattern and color, and gives them a spiritual quality.

He is not formally observant, but his background and his gut feeling as a Jew emerge in the mezuzah covers, chanukiyot, menorot and Shabbat candlesticks that comprise much of his collection. Though contemporary, geometric in form, they arise from an ancient heritage.

Confident in his mastery of these traditionally based works, Shemesh is exploring new concepts. He spends innumerable hours intricately crafting "reverse pictures" in which he works from the back, almost as in a mirror image, painstakingly carving in various depths to render them three dimensional, and intricately painting every facet.

Shemesh concedes that he cannot draw. Each reverse picture is done in cooperation with an artist, who, in consultation with him, outlines the design on paper affixed to a rubber mat on the back. Then, Shemesh starts to cut through the mat into the glass.

His Autumn Leaves (artist John Taw) is a hand-carved drift of falling maple leaves, twisting, turning, even lying curled and broken on the ground, painted in muted gold against an earthy background. The whole is set off by a self-frame etched and painted deep green.

Shemesh notes that Steve Stavro, chairman of the board of the Toronto Maple Leaf Hockey Club, is interested in seeing Autumn Leaves with a view to displaying it in the new Air Canada Centre, which will be home to the Maple Leafs and the Raptors.

For his most recent reverse picture, Jerusalem, the Old City, Shemesh looked for a Jewish artist who could understand what he wanted to say. Arik Bendelman, originally from Russia, who also lived for a time in Israel, was his choice. The resulting scene comes alive and the stones are almost palpable.

Judd Shemesh

Now Shemesh is exploring in an extraordinary direction. Three years ago in his Miami studio (he winters in Florida), he was experimenting with a cross when a Catholic client, his interest piqued by a Jew who would craft such a symbol, put him in touch with John C. Favarola, archbishop of Miami. Archbishop Favarola bought the cross.

When it was learned that Pope John Paul II plans to celebrate the beginning of the millennium with a New Year's Eve mass in Bethlehem, the Miami archbishop asked Shemesh to submit a fitting gift that would be presented to the Pope as a memento of the occasion.

Shemesh designed a model for an inscribed glass cross which will be reproduced in the desired size. To his knowledge, this is the first free-standing cross to be created as an object of art. "They are usually set against walls or worn on the body," he observes.

He regards the cross that he is making for the Pope quite simply as an artwork in keeping with the Israeli government's policy of bringing people together.

Shemesh's Glassique pieces are available in the Toronto area at such shops as Ashley's, Goodman's, Matana Judaica and Israel's, as well as across Canada and in Israel, the United States and South America.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5759, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the literary community are reading.

Matt Cohen, whose last novel Last Seen will soon be published in Dutch, is reading Robert Stone's Damascus Gate – "a very interesting novel about Jewish millenarianism. One of its themes is the tendency for some people to desire to rescue themselves from the present by believing the apocalypse will arrive. It presents a very different and fascinating portrait of Jerusalem, and an interesting interpretation of what drives Israeli politics."

Cohen is also reading The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara by David Kertzer (Vintage), a nonfiction tale about how Catholics kidnapped a 6-year-old Italian Jewish boy in 1858 after the family maid covertly baptised him. "Like Damascus Gate, it combines research and narrative skill in a very interesting way," says Cohen.

Montreal poet and short-story writer Robyn Sarah is reading A. B. Yehoshuah's The Lover (E.P. Dutton softbound), which "presents a really good portrait of the complexity of Israeli society."

Sarah says she particularly admires Yehoshuah's trademark use of multiple first-person narratives. "He makes a real effort to try to see from a variety of different perspectives. His technique of monologues means that you're always seeing from the inside, and you get to see different people's perspectives of the same event. It's a very good method for describing an extremely complex society.

"What I profoundly admire about him is that even though he has things to say that are political and sociological, his characters are completely real and well-rounded. They're never just mouthpieces. His characterization is what amazes me."

Philip Roth "is the writer on this earth whom I most admire," says Toronto lawyer-novelist Morley Torgov, who recently finished Roth's latest novel, American Pastoral (Houghton Mifflin). "I'll go so far as to say, I really think all of us novelists should retire from the field and leave it to Roth. He just gets better by the book. There's so much depth to his writing, he's got such incredible skill...if he doesn't win the Nobel Prize one day, I'm going to quit writing in protest."

According to Torgov, American Pastoral focuses on an affluent, well-educated New Jersey family where "everything on the surface just looks wonderful – except that the daughter, as a teenager, kills four people with bombs as a protest against the Viet Nam war. And then the dysfunction comes out of the woodwork."

Torgov's latest novel, The War to End All Wars, is due from Malcolm Lester Books in October.

Publisher Malcolm Lester is currently reading Remembering Mr. Shawn at the New Yorker: The Invisible Art of Editing, by Ved Mehta (Overlook Press), which he calls "terrific – I love Mehta's style, a very expansive, generous style of writing. Also, the subject matter is fascinating: how the New Yorker worked in the 1960s and 1970s and how it bore the imprint of one man, William Shawn.

Lester is also reading Explaining Hitler by Ron Rosenbaum (Random House), which he describes as "an attempt to understand how Hitler the man became Hitler the paragon of evil."

Ellen Seligman, senior fiction editor at McClelland and Stewart in Toronto, has been turning the pages of Jamaica Kincaid's My Brother (Farrar Strauss Giroux), which describes the death of her brother from AIDS in the Caribbean.

"It's one of the most brutally honest, magnificently written books – very powerful," says Seligman. "It's a completely unsentimental exploration of loss; the rhythm of the prose is hypnotic. I think it's an extraordinarily important book. It's a very personal book but it clearly has a lot of universal resonance."

Toronto novelist Cary Fagan has just finished reading Buying On Time by Antanas Sileika (Porcupine's Quill), a collection of linked stories of eastern European immigrants in the Toronto suburb of Weston in the early 1950s. "It's very much a book about a patriarchal father and his relationship with his sons," says Fagan.

Fagan is also reading The Bull Is Not Killed, a first novel by Toronto writer Sarah Dearing (Stoddart). "It's a pure pleasure to read," he says. He describes it as a combination adventure story, political story and romantic story set in Portugal at the end of the Portuguese dictatorship in the 1970s.

Fagan's first children's book, Gogol's Coat, is due in bookstores in October and his next novel, Felix Roth, is scheduled for publication in the spring.

Daniel Rubinoff showcases saxaphone's Jewish soul

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Saxophonist Daniel Rubinoff wants to breathe some new life into classical music.

Following his 1997 gold medal-winning performance at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto, for which he received the highest score of all orchestral instruments in diploma recital, Rubinoff has taken the next step with his current CD The Old Castle.

Self-released last November on his label Carnival Records, the album showcases the classical but less familiar side of the saxophone.

"I want to expose people to the timeless beauty of the classical saxophone," Rubinoff says. "It parallels the development of jazz. The joy of the performance is not just in revisiting the music, but in opening it to reinterpretation. Many of the classical pieces for saxophone come from the last century, but are intended to be infused with new life by current artists, complementing the style of the day."

Featuring solo compositions intended for traditional orchestral instruments and original concert pieces written specifically for the sax, Rubinoff says the album reflects the modern evolution of the music, tied closely to the contributions of Jewish Canadians.

Inspired by the works of renowned musicians Paul Brodie, his personal mentor, and composer Srul Irving Glick, both recipients of the Order of Canada, Rubinoff says the two have provided a strong foundation that he and others can build on, as well as helping him develop a style that is "particularly Jewish."

"Glick is important for so many saxophonists because he is a late 20th-century composer who has written original music intended for the classical saxophone," he says.

Daniel Rubinoff

"Brodie is a contemporary of Glick, and the first to champion his work. Glick combines a traditional western style with a distinctively Jewish character. For me as a Jewish Canadian concert saxophonist, it is an honor to perform the work of a fellow countryman who has enriched our culture."

'It is an honor to perform...'

Glick, who received the Order for his contribution to Canadian and Canadian Jewish music, composed the album tracks Lullaby and Lament with Cantorial Chant.

For Lament, Rubinoff says he drew on cantorial and introductory Torah experiences from his teen years as a singer at Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, Ont. He says the early religious exposure gave him an appreciation of its integration with Jewish arts and culture.

Rubinoff brings a number of Jewish influences to The Old Castle. He composed a classical interpretation of Tango, which he says possesses a subtle Sephardi quality. This Cuban-Spanish genre could well have Jewish roots, a theory currently gaining recognition, he adds.

Other prominent Jewish musicians as Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman have been role models for his technical performance and musical methodology, he says.

Of his recent award, the 31-year-old Torontonian says the achievement is a culmination of academic and professional pursuits in the performing arts starting at age 16.

After finishing his music degree at the University of Waterloo in 1990 and then receiving a bachelor of education at the University of Toronto in 1993, Rubinoff became an artist-in-residence at the Banff Centre for the Arts in Alberta. He then went on to perform as a soloist and chamber musician in France and the United States, as well as across Canada.

While eager to learn and perform, Rubinoff has become equally eager to teach. Now an affiliate teacher at the Royal Conservatory and in private studio, Rubinoff is instructing saxophone students from primary to post-secondary levels in the Greater Toronto Area.

In Rubinoff's next next album, The Music of Daniel Rubinoff, he will not only be featured as a performer but also as a composer. Currently in pre-production, the album will explore jazz and other popular forms of the saxophone.

Rubinoff is also planning a recital tour of Jewish music for the saxophone for the 1999-2000 performance season.

City slickers can experience B.C.'s wilderness areas

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Hikers are advised to make plenty of noise as they walk through the bush!

SOOKE, B.C. — At the southernmost tip of Vancouver Island, far from any coffeeshops and beyond the takeout range of the provinces' countless sushi bars, lies the pristine wilderness surrounding Port Renfrew.

Not yet touched by the trendy coffee bars that can be found on practically every corner of Vancouver, Port Renfrew is a small town at the western end of Highway 14 that serves as the jumping-off place for outdoorsmen getting away from it all. It's a misty area studded with towering evergreen trees, craggy beaches and a shoreline that offers spectacular views of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, the narrow passage that separates Vancouver Island from the State of Washington to the south.

In the morning, seals can be seen perched on the rocky shoreline while birds of prey soar overhead. The area offers access to a user-friendly provincial park with well-groomed trails of easy grade. Despite its high volume of traffic, it remains wild country with numerous posted notices warning of black bears and cougars.

The big cats are relatively few in number and they tend to avoid human visitors. Black bears are another matter. More plentiful and bolder, they have been known to cause concern to campers and hikers alike. Hikers are advised to make plenty of noise as they walk through the bush, letting the bears know two-legged intruders are on the way. Campers are constantly warned not to store food in their tents. Attesting to the bears' presence in the park was a bear trap – resembling a big dog house on a trailer – placed near the shoreline.

Although the park's trails are geared for city slickers who like their nature in small, manageable doses, more serious hikers and campers can head for the West Coast Trail, which begins just outside Port Renfrew. The trail meanders into dense bush where camping takes on its original, backwoods nature. At a public house just outside town, where hikers stop for a cool, refreshing beverage before and after their woodland adventures, a conversation among the plaid-shirted, hiking boot set can be overheard:

"If something happens, you're three days from help," says one.

"The hike wasn't too difficult except for the ladders on the trail," said another.

"We saw one cougar, but he was a long way off," said a third.

For city folk whose idea of roughing it is getting to the restaurant before closing time, the town of Sooke and its satellite bed and breakfast (B & B) facilities are nearby. About an hour drive west of Victoria on highway 14, Sooke is a small town that has become well know in the Lower Mainland as a romantic getaway that has all the luxuries of a downtown hotel set in the rugged wilderness of the Pacific Rainforest.

Our B & B, the Lighthouse Retreat, like others in the area was located in the woods just off the highway, overlooking the Strait of Juan de Fuca. Rooms offered a spectacular view and could accommodate either couples or families. Breakfast at the lodge provided more than the recommended daily requirements of roughage, consisting of fresh fruit salad and freshly baked items (still hot) like oatmeal cookies, scones, banana bread and croissants. In keeping with the area's reputation for nature-loving, tie-dyed-wearing tree-huggers, all the food was organic, free of pesticides and herbicides.

A three-hour drive north of Sooke, past Nanaimo but not quite as far as Comox or Courtney, is Buckley Bay, notable only as a ferry port for Denman and Hornby Islands, two popular vacation destinations in Georgia Strait.

Although Hornby's population grows by leaps and bounds in the summer, the locals maintain their unique, alternative lifestyle. An institution on Hornby is the organic farm run by a British-accented, middle-aged farmer who appears like a refugee from the '60s. With his scraggly, untamed beard, he could be mistaken for the bass player in ZZ Top.

Produce from his farm, like cucumbers, tomatoes, beans and onions are tasty and reasonably priced. Sums are totalled on a chalk board, another throwback to the days before supermarkets and electronic cash registers. Bigger ticket items can be purchased at the island's one co-op grocery store.

The summer fair is another island highlight while a visit to sculptor Wayne Ngan's studio is recommended.

Hornby's popularity can be attributed in large measure to its sandy beaches, something unique in British Columbia, which is known for its rocky and stone-strewn beachfront.

The beach at Tribune Bay is as enticing as any this side of the Atlantic. The water is shallow, resulting in relatively warm temperatures (compared to the rest of the West Coast) for swimmers and frolicking kids.

Helliwell Provincial Park offers a spectacular hiking trail that includes a walk on the bluffs overlooking Georgia Strait. It is undoubtedly one of the most beautiful jogging trails anywhere. Blackberry bushes are everywhere along the roads, which are a cyclist's delight. Far from city lights, watching the stars in all their glory is another favorite Hornby pastime.

New drug helps fight against breast cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An international study has shown that arimidex, a new hormonal agent, not only increases the life span of women with advanced breast cancer, but also causes minimal side effects.

The findings were announced last week at a press conference in downtown Toronto by Kathleen Pritchard, head of the division of clinical trials and epidemiology at Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre and co-chair of Breast Cancer Site Group, National Cancer Institute of Canada, Clinical Trials Group.

Calling the new drug "good news," she said that it allows women "a brave and beautiful survival."

Arimidex is now considered the second line drug of choice for stage 4 breast cancer. Once the cancer has spread beyond the original location, and surgery, radiation therapy, and finally tamoxifen have proven ineffective, those given arimidex were 22 percent more likely to be alive after two years than those treated with megestrol acetate (megase), which until now has been used in these cases.

Megase also has serious side effects, most particularly continuing weight gain, which Pritchard noted has led to a loss of self-esteem and a poorer quality of life.

The significance of the study can be seen in the brutally objective statistics: breast cancer is the most frequent type of cancer in Canada, the United States and other western countries, the second most frequent cause of cancer death.

Two-thirds of the cases of breast cancer occur in postmenopausal women. Pritchard explained that estrogen feeds and sustains tumors. Before menopause, estrogen comes mainly from the ovaries. Even after menopause, there is still a substantial level in the body, because of an enzyme called aromatase.

Arimidex is an aromatase inhibitor. The effect of the drug is to lower the estrogen levels to almost unmeasurable levels.

Jean-Marc Nabholtz, chair of the Northern Alberta Breast Cancer Program and Breast Cancer International Research Group, Cross Cancer Institute in Edmonton, said that 764 patients with metastasized breast cancer in 127 centres in North America, Europe, South Africa and Australia took part in the study between March 1993 and September 1994.

The participants were assigned randomly ("this is the strictest, most reliable research model") to one of three groups. One group received megase, one took a 1 mg dose of arimidex and the third a 10 mg dose.

Pritchard told The CJN that the study showed no difference in results with the two different strengths of the drug, and so, in accord with the policy of using the lowest quantity of drug that is effective, the suggested dose is 1 mg.

"We are not used to seeing survivors," Nabholtz said, noting that 56 percent of the women were still alive after the two year study, as compared to only 46.3 percent on megase.

The results are considered highly reliable, Nabholtz said, because the research was done according to very strict guidelines.

The fact that there are so few side effects is important, because it directly impacts on the patient's quality of life.

A reporter in the audience asked a participant in the study, Ottawa freelance artist Betty Graham, why one would be concerned with weight gain when one has a terminal illness.

Graham joked first that "You obviously don't understand women," and then noted that in a society where physical attractiveness is highly valued, serious weight gain is extremely upsetting to women who have already had mastectomies, and are under tremendous emotional strain.

Pritchard explained that because all drugs eventually become ineffective, it is possible "to use lines of therapy." Tamoxifen is still considered highly effective as a first line drug when the cancer has spread, and also as a preventative.

"[After mastectomy and radiation], tamoxifen is usually effective for five years.'

Research is currently being carried out comparing arimidex to tamoxifen, both in staving off recurrences of breast cancers and in halting the progression of the disease.

Pritchard suggested that it is possible that some combination of the two drugs might be the most effective treatment.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. When I am trying to diet, I often turn to jujubes for a sugar fix because I understand they are fat free. Is this true?

A. It is true that jujubes are low in calories and virtually fat free; 3.5 ounces of jujubes contain 79 calories and 0.2 grams of fat.

Q. I am wondering what the appropriate age is to introduce infant cereal?

A. This is something that can vary depending on your child and on your pediatrician. You should discuss this with your child's doctor. Usually infant cereals are first introduced at approximately four months of age.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist, specializing in pediatric and adult nutrition in Toronto. If you have any nutrition questions send them to The CJN.

Israeli election rules leave no middle ground

By ORIT SHOCHAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

Benjamin Netanyahu's victory in the next elections is already guaranteed. It is very important to read the polls correctly because one can glean from them that even if the left-wing candidates for prime minister – Ehud Barak and Roni Milo – together garner most of the votes, the right will benefit from the split on the left.

Under the old election method, it would have been possible to combine Barak and Milo's constituents and form a government. The current method of electing a prime minister does not accumulate votes, but tosses out the loser's votes. It is likely that in the first round of voting Netanyahu will receive 39 percent of the vote, while Barak and Milo get 61 percent, and nonetheless, in the second round, Netanyahu will win. The promise of the first-round loser endorsing the second-round candidate closest to his own views is a false one.

Roni Milo

From experience accumulated over the years in other countries, says professor and Labor MK Shevach Weiss, one can learn that in the second round, voters do not usually adopt the recommendations of the first-round loser. If Milo comes in third, perhaps he may (or may not) advise his constituents to vote for Barak in the second round, but the endorsement will have only limited influence.

Effectively, the cards will be reshuffled. Remember that the second round will immediately follow the first round of campaigning in which every candidate will do the maximum to defame the candidate he may later endorse. In the second round it will be tough to tell voters to forget everything they heard.

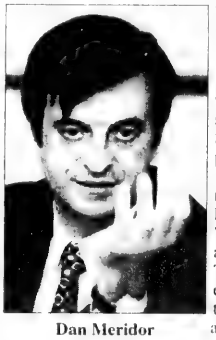
All those now pondering a run for prime minister, be it as the Arab or secularist candidate, the candidate of the new centre or the sane centre or the true centre, must take into account that in the new system, whoever drops out of the first round no longer exists. Therefore all those people circulating and searching for a political platform that perfectly suits them and their cronies should align themselves with one of the two camps. Milo, for example, can form a centrist secular party, but if he wants to see Netanyahu go, he has to give up his campaign to be prime minister and support Barak.

If Amnon Shahak, Matan Vilnai, Yehuda Harel, Milo and Dan Meridor were to stop searching for perfection and give a boost to Barak, whose positions they barely disagree with, Barak too would finally take off.

Why didn't Milo join the Labor party? Why did Shahak not announce, as Uri Saguy did before him, that the Labor party is the natural place for him? What political goods is Vilnai actually selling? Vilnai wants to get out of Hebron, but not leave Ba'al Hazor. Is that a reason to form a new party? Or maybe Vilnai just wants to know where Shahak is going so that they do not both crowd into the same party? After all, everyone searches for the place where he will stand out and his weight will be relatively significant.

Milo, it seems, dreams of being a senior minister in the government of whoever wins. Vilnai certainly dreams more than anyone else of being defence minister over Shaul Mofaz, but in the meantime he is embellishing himself with phrases like "armed peace" instead of "peace now," just as Harel is dreaming of forming "a new centrist party." It seems that all these seekers of the centre are essentially searching for a non-party party.

They seek something fresh, with no pitfalls, no past, perhaps even no politics. They all want to be wherever the most desirable star is – Dan Meridor. Meridor, who abandoned the Greater Land of Israel idea after the Oslo agreements, is today closer to Barak and even to Yossi Beilin than he is to his childhood friend Benny Begin. However, Meridor cannot cross the lines because of historical reasons. When he says "the Likud is my home," he is using emotional explanations that are amazingly similar to those given by Sephardi Jews for their opposition to the Labor party.



Dan Meridor

Meridor also has bad memories of the historical Mapai (Land of Israel Workers' party), but they are irrelevant and irrational. The more talk there is of elections, the more filled the newspaper supplements and talk shows will be with wavering voters. Each one will explain his not joining one of the existing camps by saying he is unwilling to compromise. Except that in politics, refusing to compromise is not an advantage. Those who chose the white ballot in the 1996 elections, because Shimon Peres was not what they hoped he would be, today are hiding in shame.

Every person now looking for the true centre must realize that the concept of "the centre" is an election time fiction. A minute after the vote, it becomes clear that there are only winners and losers – there is nothing in the middle.

JCC Maccabi team finishes with fewer medals

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Toronto's JCC Maccabi team faced stiffer competition in Detroit than it did at last year's Hartford games, and returned home with substantially fewer medals, said Toronto co-delegation head Grant Smith.

After a first place finish in Hartford last year, with a team record 101 medals including 52 golds, this year's squad finished out of the top three, but in the top 10, at a much larger competition, Smith said.

But the extent of the disappointment will not be known for "several months," when full results, including final medal counts, become available, said Michele Tarrance, the athletic coordinator of the Detroit games.

She said the delay is a result of meet staff's having dispersed after the Aug. 16 to 23 games, before official results could be tabulated.

"Under normal circumstances," results would already be compiled, Tarrance said. "This isn't normal circumstances."

One of the biggest letdowns for the Toronto squad was that the boys 15-16-year-old basketball team lost to the St. Paul's team in the first round of the playoffs. St. Paul's was beaten in the next round.

Smith said the boys, who he thought would win a medal, "were not expecting a strong team" from the St. Paul's delegation and "just lost their game.

"It was very disappointing," he said. "There were a lot of tears shed on the court."

The girls team, by contrast, made the quarter-finals amidst lower expectations, Smith said.

"[The girls] really came together as a team and played above what we thought their capabilities were, which was just to make the playoffs, which they did, and they won one more game," he said.

This year's squad of 70 boys and 28 girls aged 13 to 16 went to the larger of two JCC Maccabi events. Over 2,500 athletes competed in Detroit, compared to about 1,000 at the smaller games a week earlier in Charlotte, N.C.

Most of the largest North American Jewish communities sent teams to Seattle last year, while about 1,000 athletes competed in Hartford.

For that reason, the Toronto team faced "more competition this year," said Smith, making it hard to compare one year to another. "Last year's games weren't as strong."

However, "we did the best of any Canadian city," Smith said.

In Detroit, Toronto competed against Canadian teams from Montreal, Hamilton and Ottawa, as well as teams from Los Angeles, Dallas and New York, and national teams from Great Britain, Israel and Mexico.

But for the athletes, there was more to the games than competition, Smith said, since many of the Toronto athletes have "little Jewish identity."

"For our kids, this was the best games, the best Jewish experience they've ever had," Smith said. "Some of the kids said this was the best thing that's ever happened to them...and they made friends forever."

Another disappointment came in boys 15-16 soccer, which lost on a shootout in the quarter finals to the South Jersey team.

"For every soccer player, losing in a shootout is always disappointing," Smith said.

Other medal highlights for the Toronto squad included:

• a gold for one of two beach volleyball teams,with the other team making the tournament quarter finals.

• a gold in boys 13-14 singles tennis for Bryan Weinberg and a doubles silver for Weinberg and partner Adam Wexler.

• a gold in girls 15-16 doubles tennis for Melissa Cutler and Ora Wexler. Cutler also won a singles bronze.

• a gold in girls 15-16 high jump for Jody Naiberg, who also won a silver in the long jump and a bronze in the shot put.

• a gold in boys 15-16 sprint medley 4 x 100 metre relay.

• a gold for David Albertyn and silver for Michael Small in the boys 15-16 4 x 400 metre orphan relay. Albertyn also won gold in both the sprint medley orphan relay and the co-ed 4 x 400 metre orphan relay.

• a swimming gold in girls 200 metre breast stroke for Aliza Goodman.

• a silver in boys 15-16 baseball, losing 12-2 to the Los Angeles team, their only loss of the tournament.

• a silver in boys 13-14 4 x 200 metre orphan relay for Eitan Waldman.

• a swimming silver in the boys 15-16 400 metre free relay.

• a swimming bronze in the boys 15-16 200 metre butterfly for Jordan Chittley.

• a bronze in boys 15-16 doubles tennis for Tomir Wolfson and Evan Weinzberg.

• a bronze for Mark Eade in boys 15-16 4 x 200 metre orphan relay.

• a bronze in both the boys 15-16 1,600 and 3,200 metres for David Albertyn.

• a bronze for Brett Gorenstein in boys 15-16 "Texas Scramble" (or best ball) golf.

• a bronze in boys 15-16 sprint medley orphan relay for Michael Small.

HAMILTON — Hamilton-area athletes won 13 medals at the recently concluded JCC Maccabi Youth in Detroit.

David Waxman was the big winner, collecting one gold, two silver and a bronze in track and field while Bob Tuite was close behind with one gold and two bronze, also in track and field.

In table tennis, Beckie Katz won a silver and a bronze. Ashley Ricketts came home with a silver.

Aubrey Levy, Michael Dressler and Simon Wolpert each won a bronze medal in the Games' golf tournament.

The Inside Back

Seinfeld wouldn't enjoy this Israeli law

As far as I can remember, the Seinfeld gang never visited Israel. Judging by the last episode in the series, when they got in trouble with the law for not helping somebody, and in light of a law passed by the Knesset on June 22 this year, they won't want to, either.

The name of the law is The Do Not Stand Idly by Your Neighbor's Blood Law, 5758-1998, the name of the biblical commandment (Leviticus 19:16) according to which one may not simply stand by and not help when another is in danger.

Such laws, often known as Good Samaritan laws, are controversial in legal literature. Among other things, questions have been raised about the moral basis on which the state requires one to endanger oneself or even merely go out of one's way in order to help others. While it is clear that the penal code is justified in forbidding us to harm others, requiring a positive act of help is quite a different matter.

The new Israeli law creates an obligation to provide assistance to a person standing nearby ("the beneficiary") who, due to a sudden occurrence, is in immediate and severe danger to his or her life, personal safety or health, as long as one can do so without endangering oneself or others. Calling the police, the Red Magen David, the fire fighters or someone else who can help is considered providing assistance. Anybody who violates the law may be subject to a monetary fine.

When this law was first proposed by Hanan Porat of the National Religious Party in March 1995, the rationale given was that the Knesset should anchor in legislation the moral and social value of saving another's life, as expressed in Leviticus. The explanation illustrates that sometimes laws are meant to influence people's thinking and behavior without actually being enforced (although the original punishment proposed was six months imprisonment, not simply a fine).

Even before this new law was passed, you could be reimbursed if you spent money to help someone when you had no legal obligation to do so. The new law applies this entitlement to situations where the law requires one to save another. In addition, the court may force the person who caused the danger to reimburse the Good Samaritan for any amounts spent.

Western societies generally hesitate to place such moral obligations on people. The liberal ethos has always allowed one to go about one's business, as long as others are not harmed. Good Samaritan laws legislate what has been traditionally seen as a moral choice, one which the state is not in a position to require.

At the same time, the Jewish tradition in this regard goes back to the Bible, and under Jewish law one is not free from such moral requirements.

In this way, the new law might be seen as further influence of Jewish law in the general legal system. Whether this is desirable or not depends largely on one's philosophical perspective.

Another aspect of the law, as mentioned above, is the right to collect costs from the person who caused the situation. This may provide the legal basis (lacking up to now) to charge people who need to be rescued when on hikes, swimming, etc. Such rescues are common in Israel, e.g. when hikers get lost in the desert or swimmers get caught in streams, and cost the state significant amounts of money. The state may now be in a position to charge people for the cost of the rescue, which might in turn create an incentive to be more careful.

I personally doubt that we will now see a wave of convictions of people whose crime was that they did not help others. At the same time, the new law may have a beneficial effect on people's behavior. Whether we will ever be able to truly know that is another question.

Jonathan Shiff practices law in Israel.

LOVELY LENTIL SOUP
WE SELL JENN-AIR FOR LESS

3 tblsp margarine (or oil)	3 pints water
1 large onion, chopped	1 marrow bone, cracked
1 celery stalk with leaves, chopped	salt & pepper to taste
1 carrot, chopped	juice of 1/2-1 lemon
3/4 lb. lentils, washed	1 tsp cumin

Melt margarine (heat oil) and soften the onion, celery and carrot. Add lentils, water and bone and bring to a boil. Skim. Simmer gently, covered, until lentils are very soft, between 3/4-1 1/2 hrs. until lentils are no longer whole. When done, season with salt and pepper, add lemon juice and cumin. Simmer a few minutes longer and remove bone. Put in a blender to make a smooth puree. Return soup to pot and boil again. You can add a bit more water if you want a lighter soup, or evaporate by simmering a little longer to reduce and thicken it.

About Life

Dear Ella,

When I was growing up, my family always belonged to an Orthodox synagogue. Although throughout my younger years I experienced many changes as far as the degree of observance that was practised in my home, I have always been very comfortable praying in an Orthodox shul.

I am married now and have a 4-year-old daughter. Although I am not observant anymore, I am still traditional and try to bring Judaism into our home by celebrating all the holidays in some way. My husband, who rarely goes to synagogue, suggested we go together this year for a High Holy Day service. However, he wants to sit together so we can experience our first time in shul sitting on either side of our daughter.

I was very excited about his proposition and bought tickets to a service where we could all sit together and enjoy the prayers both in language and in meaning.

Here is the catch. I have never been to a Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur service that wasn't Orthodox and I'm not sure I am comfortable with this arrangement. What do you think?

Reforming My Life

Dear Reforming My Life,

Congratulations on creating a home for your family in which you were able to bring your husband's way of thinking around by celebrating all the Jewish holidays.

You obviously brought enough Yiddishkeit into the lives of your family for him to want to take the step of adding prayer and meaning to why you are celebrating all these different holidays.

In my opinion I don't feel you have made a mistake. You have been given an opportunity to enjoy going to shul with your whole family. What a special experience.

I can understand how moving from the familiarity of an Orthodox shul can be unnerving for you. You probably feel as if you are almost betraying what you were taught to follow your whole life, but think of this as a major step in bringing your family together in a new way the three of you have yet to experience.

When the shofar sounds so loud and powerful on the holidays, you get goose bumps regardless of where you hear it.

Shanah Tovah.

El Al expands service

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel' s national air carrier will add at least one, perhaps two, non-stop flights from Toronto to Israel beginning in April 1999.

The confirmed flight will leave Toronto on Sundays, while the second projected flight will depart on Thursdays, said Moshe Shamai, El Al's Canadian manager.

Currently, El Al flies from Toronto to Israel three times a week, however, the flights are routed through Montreal or New York. El Al's major competitor, Air Canada, offers non-stop flights to Israel from Toronto, and the Canadian airline has made considerable inroads into El Al's Canadian market.

Shamai said El Al is able to offer the non-stop flights thanks to the purchase from Air France of a long distance version of the Boeing 767 aircraft. The 767 has the range and the passenger capacity to serve the Toronto market. An earlier attempt to fly non-stop to Israel using a 747 proved unsuccessful because "it's too large for this route," Shamai said.

If the new flights prove successful, Toronto will be served by four weekly departures to Israel – two non-stop and two via Montreal, he added.

El Al is taking other steps to make it more attractive to Canadian passengers flying to the Holy Land. Among them:

• a "bar mitzvah" program in which children approximately 13 years of age who travel to Israel with both parents will be given a 50 percent ticket discount;

• a 20 percent discount for parents who fly to Israel to visit their children who are in the Holy Land on an educational or other program. The child must also hold an El Al ticket with a return date indicating a lengthy stay in Israel;

Mandela attends simcha

By LINDA LEWIS
Special to The CJN

At 13, many kids are already jaded and cynical, knowing that the platitudes adults dish out to kids – like "dreams can come true" – are often false.

Not my nephew Craig. Two years ago, when Craig decided to invite his idol, Nelson Mandela, to his "barmie" in Johannesburg, everyone thought it was ridiculous, an adolescent whim. But he had a dream, and if a man who'd endured 27 years of imprisonment could become president of the nation and lead his country to freedom, surely anything was possible.

Craig's parents at first laughed, then rolled their eyes, then shooed him away, as they listened to their son's meshugene plan. But Craig, like his hero, persisted.

Finally, a month before the bar mitzvah, he persuaded his Grampa Lionel – used to indulging his grandchildren at every opportunity – to drive him to Mandela's Houghton home, not too far from their own Johannesburg suburb. Craig gave a simple, handwritten note, along with the invitation, to the security guard at the gate. The guard promised that the president would get it, and that was the end of it...or so they thought.

Feature

When the phone call came from the president's personal assistant two weeks before the big event, Craig's mom thought it was a hoax. But before she knew it, she was faxing guest lists for a security check, and answering Mandela's questions: What is a bar mitzvah? And how many children would be attending?

The Sept. 7 party was not your typical affair. Sniffer dogs and metal detectors are a rarity at bar mitzvot, even in South Africa. And the rabbi's wife doesn't get bumped from her head-table seat of honor for just anybody!

Since no one but the immediate family knew who was coming to dinner, it turned into the do of the season. How would the Jewish mothers of Joburg top this (Does Nelson do weddings)?

When Mandela entered the room, the kids rushed up and swarmed him like a rock star. Belying his age of 78 in a bold, African print shirt that matched his salt-and-pepper hair, Mandela tried a few steps of the horah, and personally greeted every one of the 240 men, women and children in the room, including my 5-year-old son, who had no idea who this nice man shaking everybody's hand was.

Siemens Comes Aboard

BONN — A second German firm says it will set up a fund to compensate slave laborers who toiled for the company during World War II. The decision by the electronics firm Siemens to establish the $11.9-million fund comes after Volkswagen announced it would set up an $11.7-million slave labor compensation fund.

Swiss Miffed at Netanyahu

BERN — Swiss officials say they may cancel an economic conference aimed at improving bilateral business ties with Israel. Their anger was sparked by a letter written by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to Edgar Bronfman, in which Netanyahu thanked the president of the World Jewish Congress for his efforts to get Swiss banks to pay Holocaust-era claims.

Greetings From Zyuganov

MOSCOW — The leader of Russia's Communist party sent Rosh Hashanah greetings to the country's Jewish community. In his letter read during services at the Moscow Choral Synagogue, Gennady Zyuganov noted the Jewish contribution to the defeat of Nazi Germany and condemned anti-Semitism in Russia.

Brothers To Open Shul

LONDON — Two British Jewish brothers known for the advertising firm they founded are opening a synagogue that will be named after them. Charles and Maurice Saatchi have launched a full-blown advertising campaign for their own Orthodox synagogue. The Saatchi Synagogue is scheduled to open in October.

Citizenships Revoked

WASHINGTON — Two Americans suspected of Nazi war crimes have had their citizenship revoked. The Department of Justice alleges that Walter Berezowskyj, 73, of Guilford, Conn., served as an armed guard at the Poniatowa labor camp, where thousands of Jewish prisoners were interned and later shot to death.

And a federal judge revoked the citizenship of Adolph Milius, formerly of St. Petersburg, Fla., for allegedly assisting in the persecution of Jews in Vilnius, Lithuania, where he fled in 1996 after the complaint was entered against him.

No Jews: Priest

WARSAW — A Polish priest known for his anti-Semitic remarks said Poles should not vote for Jews or Russians in next month's government elections. Henryk Jankowski, who is banned from preaching because of an anti-Semitic sermon he gave last year, made his remarks before a religious service began.

Local elections are scheduled to be held in Poland on Oct. 11.

Israelis Flock to Casino in Jericho

JERICHO — The biblical Joshua who led the Israelites' siege of Jericho could never have dreamed that stud poker would breathe life back into this dusty Palestinian-ruled town.

But last week, hundreds of Israelis made the 30-minute drive down the winding road from Jerusalem to place their bets at Oasis, a new gambling complex in Jericho and the first big foreign investment in the Palestinian self-rule areas.

They found 35 gaming tables and 220 slot machines amid the classic casino-kitsch decor, beneath a star-studded ceiling. The $50-million (US) casino is the first stage of a $150-million investment in a tourist complex that will eventually include 800 hotel rooms, a golf course and conference facilities.

Paul Herzfeld, chief executive of Casinos Austria, which operates Oasis, said Jericho was chosen because of "the magical setting of the desert against the city."

His description of the setting made no mention of an impoverished Palestinian refugee camp directly across the road, perhaps because the camp is hard to see at night – it has no electricity.

Jewish sailor fails in bias claim against navy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Federal Court of Canada has agreed with a Jewish sailor who charged that he was denied a plum posting during the Gulf War because of his religion.

But at the same time, the court found that the process by which Andrew Liebmann was denied the post does not violate Canada's Charter of Rights.

The court said it was satisfied that Liebmann was qualified for the job, which he did not get "because of his religion."

But the court did not do what Liebmann had wanted: strike down as unconstitutional the military's policy on who can be excluded from peacekeeping.

In fact, the court ruled that the policy had been wrongly applied to Liebmann, who was on active duty during an armed conflict.

His lawyers plan to appeal the part of the ruling which upholds the military's right to exclude personnel from some missions.

Liebmann, now 34, had argued he was the victim of anti-Jewish bias, and that a long-standing Canadian Armed Forces policy barring Jews and Muslims from some peacekeeping operations violated his constitutional rights.

The case goes back to 1990, when Liebmann was serving as a reservist lieutenant aboard the HMCS Discovery in Vancouver. Just as the Gulf War began, he applied for the job of executive assistant to Commodore Kenneth Summers, then commander of Canadian forces in the Middle East. The posting was to Bahrain.

Liebmann said he was hired and was even sent orders to prepare to go to the Gulf. But he said he was then told his application had been revoked because of his religion, and that another officer had been hired.

He said he was told that the Forces' official position was that being a Jew in Bahrain – particularly when tensions were escalating between Iraq and Israel – would pose a risk to his personal safety and impair his ability to do his job.

Finally, Liebmann said he was told the job was posted in error, and that Summers' aide would be staying on.

Liebmann launched an internal grievance, which took two years to complete. But it failed to address his belief that he was discriminated against as a Jew, and he took the military to court.

Military policy upheld

Justice Paul Rouleau of the Federal Court found that internal navy communications determined that Liebmann was Jewish, and he threw out the military's contention that Liebmann's faith was not a factor in their selection.

While Liebmann was treated shabbily, his constitutional rights were not violated, the court found.

The court upheld the military's selection policy, which allows some members of the Armed Forces to be excluded from peacekeeping missions based on the "cultural, religious or other sensitivities" of the parties involved, and of the host country.

For example, the military testified it would not send soldiers of Vietnamese descent on a peacekeeping mission to Khmer Rouge-controlled areas in Cambodia.

The ruling states that the policy is applied on a case-by-case basis "and not to screen classes of members based upon stereotypical views of groups to which they belong. There has not been any 'blanket prohibition' imposed as a result of the policy in question."

Nevertheless, the court blasted the military's policy as "poorly drafted," and said it was incorrectly applied to Liebmann, who was not part of a peacekeeping mission.

Liebmann, who now works on oil tankers, "proved he was a victim of discrimination," his lawyer, Sam Hayman, told The CJN in a telephone interview from Vancouver.

The ruling sends the message to prospective soldiers and sailors that they better hide their ethnicity, culture and religion if they wish to climb the ranks, Hayman said.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada had joined the case, also in an effort to strike down the military's peacekeeping selection policy.

The League had argued that Canada systematically bars Jews and Muslims from peacekeeping missions in the Middle East.

League lawyer David Matas was resigned to the ruling.

"These battles are won inch by inch," he said. With the court's finding that Liebmann was discriminated against, "we've gotten a bit closer to the goal line."

U.S. losing out at the UN

By THOMAS O. HECHT

Guest Voices

The Palestinian Authority recently achieved enhanced status at the United Nations. The Palestinians sought non-voting member status, which they did not get, contrary to press reports. But the big loser was not the Palestinians. The big loser was the United States, which had strongly urged the UN members to vote against the proposal.

As a result of the vote, which was supported by Canada and the Europeans, the Palestinians' present observer status was enhanced, elevating them above other observer groups. The resolution was passed 124 to 4 with 10 abstentions. So much for American clout.

Yes, the United States lost, notwithstanding its attempts to urge member states to vote against the proposal, stating that this was the wrong resolution at the wrong time, for it would cause suspicion and mistrust between negotiating parties, and would not bring the parties closer to their goal. The U.S lack of influence on the world body can be blamed only on a lack of U.S. global leadership.

Saddam Hussein beat the United States at the potentially lethal weapons inspection game. The time has come for the president of the United States to make it clear to allies and foes what the U.S./Iraq policy is. It seems that the administration is ambiguous in establishing its intent; instead it has shifted the responsibility for Iraq policy from the White House to the UN, which means shifting it away from those who can implement and execute policy decisions.

The U.S. secretary of state has even suggested to the chief of the UN committee on Iraqi weapons compliance, Richard Butler, that he should not further alienate Hussein with surprise inspections. As a result, the chief of the UN weapons inspection team resigned and accused the members of the UN security council of being co-conspirators in allowing Iraq to develop chemical/biological weapons.

The recent U.S. cruise missile attacks on Afghanistan and Sudan were attacks on states which are considered pariahs, even in the Muslim world. Still, Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction of the PLO has denounced the U.S. action as terrorism in the Voice of Palestine's official radio broadcast.

Recently, President Bill Clinton declined to impose sanctions on France and Russia for investments in Iran that violate U.S. laws. India and Pakistan detonated nuclear weapons – Pakistan in direct defiance of a request from the president.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) itself has received hundreds of millions of dollars from the United States, while the U.S. government ignores Palestinian violations of the Oslo accords, such as the non-amendment of the PLO charter, the permanent incitement to violence against Israel, the non-disarming of militias in areas of PA control, the stockpiling of illegal weapons by the PA, and the harboring of scores of Palestinian terrorists, several of whom have participated in terrorist murders of American citizens.

It is noteworthy that the U.S. Justice Department has refused to issue indictments, and demand the extradition of Palestinian killers of American citizens, including four who are members of Arafat's own security forces. Yet U.S. federal law obligates the U.S. Justice Department to demand their transfer to U.S. jurisdiction.

Israel has identified by name 12 Palestinian Arab terrorists involved in attacks in which 11 Americans were murdered in Israel or in the territories administered by the Palestinian Authority since the signing of the Oslo accords in 1993. Americans were also killed by terrorist bombs in Kenya, which prompted a U.S. response to the murder of Americans, even if it was a somewhat questionable response. The Palestinian Authority, it seems, is immune from American demands or retribution.

Yet, when it comes to identifying the obstacle to progress in the peace process begun in Oslo, chancelleries throughout the world and the media generally opt to blame the only reliable democratic ally of the western world in the Middle East. Presidents and prime ministers exhort Israel to take security risks they would never recommend for their own countries.

Such advocacy placates the forces of appeasement for the sake of unprincipled expediency and pragmatism. That is how Czechoslovakia disappeared piece by piece in 1938-39 in the centre of Germanic Europe. George Santayana's well-known aphorism seems applicable: "Those who do not remember the past are condemned to relive it."

The loss to the Palestinian Authority in the General Assembly from not receiving non-voting member status was a mild embarrassment. The real problem and the threat that has arisen is that the U.S. administration has made it clear that there will be no penalty to the major actors who consistently oppose America on fundamental issues of a principled, world order, of which the fundamental tenet is a move towards making democratic regimes that are more prone to live in security with their neighbors and thus achieve a more tranquil world order.

Canadian Jews differ from American cousins: Abella

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is wrong to base predictions about the future of Canadian Jewry solely on the American experience, says a leading Canadian Jewish historian.

Canadian Jews are not the "underachieving, developmentally challenged cousins" of their American counterparts, said York University professor Irving Abella at the recent inaugural lecture of the J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry.

Abella, who was recently appointed to the chair, discussed Canadian Jewry: Past, Present and Future before an audience of almost 300 people in a York lecture hall.

Lorna Marsden, president and vice-chancellor of the university, gave a brief welcoming address, as did Michael Brown, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies. Adrian Shubert, chair of the department of history, introduced the speaker.

Although Canadian Jewry is a generation closer to Europe than American Jewry, there has been a Jewish presence in Canada almost from the beginning of European settlement, Abella emphasized.

Jews were among the most important fur traders of the 1770s and '80s, he noted. There is also "compelling evidence" that Marranos, hiding their Jewish identities, sought refuge from the Spanish and Portuguese inquisitions in Quebec earlier in the same century, when

Jews were barred under the French regime from what is now Canada.

During the War of 1812, said Abella, almost every Jew of military age joined the militia. Some were promoted to become the first Jewish military officers anywhere in the British Empire. Jews here also held legislature seats before their counterparts in Great Britain, he said.

"It wasn't until the 1880s, with the beginning of mass migration from eastern Europe, that anti-Semitism became such a powerful element in Canadian society."

Although Canadian Jews early in this century suffered "dreadful" living and working conditions, they created a "Jewish world full of vitality, passion and creativity."

Yet it would be wrong to romanticize the past, Abella cautioned. "Jews were at the bottom of Canadian society.

"Just over fifty years ago the Jew was a pariah...excluded from most professions and legally prohibited from vacationing in a variety of locations."

Today, things are better than they've ever been, Abella said. "There's no area of Jewish life that's not thriving, or so it seems." At the same time, Canadian Jews are "arguably the most affluent, integrated community in the country."

Among features distinguishing us from American Jews, Abella mentioned Canada's policy of cultural diversity, which he said has enhanced Jewish self-image and fostered a more traditional, unified community than in the United States.

The large proportion of Holocaust survivors here, relative to the States, has also had an impact. About five percent of American Jewry is made up of Holocaust survivors and their children; in Canada the number is seven to eight times higher, Abella said.

Compared to American Jews, we have lower rates of intermarriage, are more Zionist, donate more money to Jewish causes, are more Orthodox, are more likely to speak Hebrew or Yiddish and are more likely to send our children to Jewish day schools, he said.

The central question facing Canada's Jewish community now, Abella said, is whether Judaism can survive in an atmosphere of unprecedented freedom. "What, aside from religion, will bind Jews together?" he asked.

"The task facing Canadian Jewry is formidable," Abella concluded. "Our history has shown that Canadian Jews are a formidable people."

Littman named to Argentine panel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sol Littman, the Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, has been named to an international panel that will review the work of a commission investigating Nazi connections to Argentina.

Littman is the only Canadian on the 20-person international committee that includes Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, and David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee.

In November, the committee will review the first annual report prepared by the Commission for the Clarification of Nazi Activities in Argentina (CEANA). The commission, which includes representatives of the Argentine Jewish community, was established by the Argentine government to examine the country's links to Nazis and Nazi loot.

CEANA has accumulated a list of 300 Nazi suspects and it will search a variety of Argentine military and state archives – which had previously been closed to researchers – for information about the suspects. Ignacio Klich, professor of Latin American history at the University of Westminster in London, serves as the commission's academic coordinator, the Miami Herald reported.

Following a preliminary meeting of the oversight committee in New York, Littman said, "I was struck by the sincerity of the Argentine representatives who met with us. I thought they were forthcoming and genuine."

The international panel decided that "we'd not just be 'yes men.' We wanted to see all the original documents" that CEANA will rely upon in reaching its conclusions, he added.

Despite all the apparent safeguards to ensure the integrity of CEANA's work, "the Jewish community in Argentina views it with some degree of skepticism and suspicion. They're taking a wait and see attitude. The fact that a Jew is heading the research team does not necessarily reassure them," Littman said.

Argentine Jews have been rocked in recent years by a spate of anti-Semitic attacks. A terrorist bombing of the community's main building in Buenos Aires killed 86 people. The Israeli Embassy was targeted in another bombing. It is widely believed the terrorists were assisted by local police.

In early August, an estimated 200 Nazi sympathizers attended a conference on Nazism held across the street from the newly rebuilt headquarters of the Jewish community centre. That came only a month after Argentine authorities established an office dedicated to searching for war criminals and monitoring neo-Nazi groups. In 1995, a group of skinheads brutally beat a man they thought was a Jew. They were released after serving only three months in jail, the Herald reported.

Meanwhile, CEANA has published its first preliminary report, in which it described its research methods and provided a historical background to its inquiries. Argentina has been a destination for German immigrants since the 1870s, the commission reported.

Former Latvian policeman wins citizenship fight

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A man who served in a Latvian police battalion that was involved in anti-partisan atrocities has won his battle to retain Canadian citizenship.

Federal Court judge William McKeown last week ruled that Peteris (Peter) Vitols did not lie about his wartime activities when he applied to immigrate to Canada in 1950.

McKeown found that security officers stationed in Europe did not uniformly implement screening criteria to weed out individuals belonging to prohibited groups, and that at least one other ex-Latvian SS man, Vitols' brother Robert, was allowed into Canada after admitting his involvement in the unit.

Members of the SS and Nazi collaborators were among those prohibited from entering Canada.

McKeown found that Vitols admitted to service in the Latvian Army, and that Canadian screening officers equated that with a Latvian SS unit. Vitols "disclosed his membership in the Latvian Army to Canadian authorities. Although Canadian policy precluded the entrance of such persons into Canada, the evidence indicates that, in practice, their admission into Canada was discretionary in the hands of visa control officers. The evidence would appear to indicate with regard to Mr. Vitols that such discretion was exercised positively."

McKeown's judgment stunned spokespeople for the Jewish community. "It's Kafka-esque," said Jack Silverstone, general counsel to Canadian Jewish Congress. "Just on the basis of his admissions, he shouldn't be allowed into Canada... It's as if it's a defence to [a charge of] obtaining citizenship by fraud to admit you were a member of a criminal organization."

"I'm genuinely dismayed. I think it's a real crisis," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. The decision demonstrates that "in the same way judges were unprepared to deal with women's issues, they're unprepared to deal with war crimes issues," he said.

McKeown "failed completely to appreciate the difference between the Latvian SS and the Schutzmannschaft battalion," he added.

In his 111-page judgment, McKeown reviewed Vitols' wartime service in a variety of police and military units. He points out Vitols volunteered to join the Madona district police in September 1941, after the area's Jews had been wiped out.

He found that in February and March 1943, Vitols and other members of that unit "were incorporated into the 281st Schutzmannschaft (Latvian auxiliary police battalion), then involved in a large-scale anti-partisan operation known as Winterzauber (Winter Magic) in the Latvian-Belorussian border district."

Vitols served as a second lieutenant and platoon commander.

Court heard evidence that the German forces practiced a scorched earth policy in which "villages used by partisans for their bases were razed to the ground" and where "the civilian population was either executed on the spot or was deported for forced labor."

McKeown accepted Vitols' testimony that he did not participate in atrocities but he rejected his testimony that the atrocities occurred after his unit was disbanded.

Despite that finding, Vitols' participation in Schuma 281 barely figured in McKeown's decision on whether Vitols misrepresented his wartime activities.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said McKeown's acceptance of Vitols' account that he wasn't personally involved in atrocities "seems to be a key point in his decision. But the focus of the Crown's case was that Vitols was a member of an inadmissible group. The fact that he was not personally involved in atrocities is neither here nor there."

Furthermore, it appears McKeown found that Vitols was not asked about his involvement in Schuma 281. "I don't agree with that conclusion," Vickery added.

Under the Immigration Act there is no right of appeal in the case. Vickery suggested the decision would not hinder other war crimes cases, since it was decided on a unique set of facts.

"We have every intention of proceeding with the program. This decision does not impact on that," he said.

Misplaced loyalty

The Complaints Commission of the RCMP begins its work next week investigating the behavior of the security officers at the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit last November in Vancouver. Canadians witnessed, with shock and disbelief, a sight relatively rare in Canada: RCMP officers man-handling apparently peaceful though pointedly political demonstrators. Police arrested more than 40 demonstrators, pepper-spraying some in the process.

Although there were a number of messages intended by the demonstrators to be seen and heard by the foreign leaders attending the summit, the real focus of their attention was President Suharto of Indonesia. They were protesting his record of human and civil rights repression. Indeed, as riot and mayhem subsequently unfolded in Indonesia, he was forced to resign his office.

From the outset, it was apparent that the atmosphere outside the summit was edgy. The RCMP seemed nervous and jumpy. In view of a number of memos and documents that have recently come to light, it is not hard to understand why. They had good reason to be.

The dictator from Indonesia essentially expected protesters in Canada to be treated here the way they would have been treated back home: mercilessly. And he brought his own security officials, some armed with guns, just to be sure.

Prior to Suharto's arrival, the ambassador to Canada from Indonesia even inquired into the nature of the possible response by Canadian authorities were his president's personal bodyguards to shoot any demonstrators! We can only speculate and hope that the mere posing of the question would have set off high-sounding, shrill alarms at RCMP headquarters. Five of those bodyguards were actually arrested and sent home by the RCMP.

Complicating the work of the RCMP was their understanding that it was important to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien that Suharto not be embarrassed by the demonstrators. How that came to be their understanding will form part of the investigation that starts next week.

With the publication of the leaked memos, accusations and allegations have been hurled against the prime minister that he personally sanctioned the roughhouse treatment of the demonstrators. Not surprisingly, some members of the opposition have called for his resignation. Whatever the extent, if any, of the prime minister's involvement in the affair last November, such a call is over-reaching.

The apology he offered last week in the House of Commons, however, was under-reaching. It stated what was obvious. "No one wished for that to happen." But it did not state what was necessary: that Canadian values were compromised, inappropriately and shamefully, in order to placate the former president of Indonesia.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms clearly enunciates the rules that apply to our way of life in Canada. Sec. 2: Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms...(Our emphasis)

(b) freedom of...opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

(c) freedom of peaceful assembly...".

Indeed, these freedoms are considered to be so universal, so basic, so integral to meaningful individual existence, they apply to all persons living in Canada. And they are "guaranteed" by law subject "only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law..." (Sec.1 of the Charter)

The peaceful protesters outside the summit meeting were entitled by law to demonstrate their opinions until and unless they became a menacing rabble, which they did not.

The first loyalty of Canadian law enforcement officials, including for this purpose, the prime minister, had to be and must always be to the laws of Canada, to the fundamental values the laws represent. It must never be displaced by the desire, even well-intentioned, to please a visiting dictator who wishes not to be embarrassed.

Troubled by allegations against IRB

I have appeared on numerous occasions before the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), both at the Appeal Division and the Refugee Division. In many instances, I have received decisions that I did not agree with, but I can candidly say that I have never experienced anti-Semitism or racism from any board member through my career at the bar.

I am extremely troubled by the allegations that have been made against the IRB and can clearly indicate that in my experience these unfortunate allegations have never surfaced.

Claims circumcision opponent off base

I am disturbed by the article "Is circumcision wrong?" by Morton Weinfeld (CJN, Sept. 17).

He related how Dr. Margaret Somerville of McGill University expressed her hope in the Montreal Gazette of Aug. 22 that religious leaders would be convinced to cease carrying out ritual circumcisions.

Somerville's opinion crossed over the boundary from medical ethics into religion, beyond her realm.

I would recommend that she be contacted by Montreal rabbinical authorities and the Canadian Jewish Congress, in order to be educated and sensitized about the meaning of Jewish law and our people's relationship with God and Torah. I would also suggest that formal complaints be lodged with her faculty dean and her university's officials.

This serious boundary violation, if left to continue, can only bring ill repute to herself, her institution and indeed the entire discipline of medical ethics.

Criticizes Peace Now position on Arafat

Re: "Arafat not responsible," Letters to the Editor, (CJN, Sept. 17).

We are used to the swiftness with which those Peace Now champions attack the current government of Israel and blame it for all the woes of the world. It now seems that they are equally fast to defend Yasser Arafat and his good repute.

I trust the co-presidents of Canadian Friends of Peace Now have visited the Fatah Web site and are familiar with its content. Yet they say that Arafat is not responsible for the actions of his own party.

Arafat was quick on several occasions to shut down Palestinian radio stations and newspapers that did not show proper reverence to the great leader. He shows no intention now of closing this forum of his own party.

Peace Now is seemingly hell-bent on absolving Arafat of all responsibility. They should stop for a moment and consider that it was precisely this lack of responsibility by Arafat that brought forward the victory of Benjamin Netanyahu, the man they hate so deeply. That intense hatred seems to be in the way of reasoned and logical thinking.

Pakistani general never made offensive remark

Re: "Pakistani general surrendered to Jew," Letters to the Editor (CJN, Sept. 10).

Isaac Judah's erroneous concept with respect to the ancestry of Lt.-Gen. J.F.R. Jacob and Judah's attribution of an alleged anti-Jewish remark to Pakistani Lt.-Gen. A.A.K. Niazi are both regrettable.

Jacob, who represented the Jews of India at the Commonwealth Jewish Council in Gibraltar in 1997, when interviewed by journalists for Jewish newspapers in the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, has always stated that he is descended from Iraqi Jewish ancestors who settled in India almost 200 years ago. His Iraqi heritage is shared by his cousins, who reside in Toronto and Ottawa, and whose parents were Arabic-speaking.

With respect to Niazi's alleged remark that it was an insult to make him sign surrender terms in front of a Jew, protocol dictated that the man who led the Indian army in the battle, Lt.-Gen. J.S. Aurora, accept Niazi's surrender. Jacob, the Indian army's chief of staff, was an honored presence at that historic signing ceremony, and Niazi's alleged remark was never made. To correct the error is particularly important in today's delicate political climate.

'Who are we to judge...?'

By ADINA ESHEL

When I opened the door, I hardly managed to suppress a scream: standing in the doorway was a monster. It was, no doubt, a woman, but her face... it was mutilated and frightening.

"Shalom," she said, "Is mother home?" "No," I whispered, my eyes fixed upon her face. What must have been her face, looked like a deformed mask. Her forehead was busted in, one eye was lower than the other, and her crooked nose made her mouth look as though she was about to cry.

Her first question must have exhausted all her Hebrew vocabulary. "I am very tired," she went on in Yiddish, "I have walked all the way from Jaffa, in this terrible heat, may I wait for your mother?" Her words brought me back to reality and I was ashamed for staring at her. I opened the door widely and asked her to come in and sit down.

Slowly she entered the living room and sat on the edge of a chair at the dinner table. I went to the kitchen for a glass of cold water. When I handed her the glass, her face grimaced with what was probably meant to be a smile. Most of her front teeth were missing. "Thank you," she said, "you are a good girl."

She drank the water slowly, looking around. I watched her, feeling terribly sorry for her. She sat there, shrunk, as though trying to minimize the space she was taking up.

It was a warm summer day, but the woman was wearing winter clothes and shoes, carrying an overcoat over her arm. She kept holding it even as she sat down, clutching her hand bag.

"I am from Lublin," she said, as though this should solve a problem. It did. At least part of the enigma was solved. She probably knew my mother.

Ever since the war ended, I got used to people from Lublin – Holocaust survivors – turning up at our door, to the delight of my parents. Some had numbers tattooed on their arms, some managed to survive without going through concentration camps; the stories of all of them were heartbreaking. This was something entirely different.

In order to overcome the silence, but mainly to avoid looking at her face, I took out a book from my schoolbag, sat on the sofa and began reading. After about 15 minutes my mother arrived.

Upon seeing the figure seated on the chair, she hesitated for a second and then cried out: "Gitta!" The woman wore once again that grimace I knew for a smile, and said: "You recognized me immediately, very few people recognize me at all," and burst out crying bitterly.

She got up and embraced my mother, who embraced her. They stood there hugging each other for long moments without uttering a word. At last mother asked: "Do you want some water?" The woman shook her head, pointing at the empty glass, and said "Your daughter had already seen to it." "Then let us sit down to eat," said my mother.

The mere idea of having to dine with that revolting face in front of me, drove my appetite away. "I have lots of homework to do," I said to my mother in Hebrew, "I'd rather do it first and eat later." I could not share my mother's courage to eat with that face in front of her.

After the meal, mother made Gitta sit on the couch and said: "Now tell me!" "I have been through so much, that I don't know where to begin" she said. "Begin with 1932, the year my husband and I left Lublin (Poland) for Palestine." "Didn't your mother write to you about me?" she asked surprised. "She was the person who helped me more than anyone else."

"Gitta used to visit with your grandmother," said my mother in Hebrew, knowing I was only pretending to be doing my homework, and was in fact listening to their conversation. "She used to be a beautiful and diligent young girl," mother added in Yiddish.

Gitta turned to me and said: "Your grandmother was a true angel; she took care of me as though I were her own daughter. She taught me everything I know and made a mentsch of me," and as if continuing an inner thread of thought she went on: "Despite all that I have been through, I have kept my respectability, no one can say I didn't."

All through that afternoon Gitta went on telling my mother what she had gone through during the period of the Holocaust. She spoke slowly, as though visualizing each scene, and living it once again. Often she would burst out crying, unable to restrain herself.

In 1935, she married a young man against his parents' will. They had two children, a boy and a girl. She could not work, and his salary was not enough. His parents wouldn't help, her parents couldn't. They moved to another town, and just before the war broke out, they returned to Lublin. When the Nazis came, they stayed in the Lublin ghetto. Her husband became ill and she tried to provide for the family.

One day she went out for some food, and when she returned her husband and children were gone, as were some other Jewish residents of her neighborhood, mostly the sick, the old or children. There was a raid, and they were taken to the nearby extermination camp in Majdanek.

She then fled the ghetto to a Polish village. "I worked hard, believe me I worked hard, but believe me I kept my decency, all through the war I kept my decency, no one will be able to deny it," she repeated.

For a while she stayed in that village, but fearing she would be handed over to the Gestapo, she moved on to another village and then to another. Finally she came to a village on the border between Poland and Ukraine, where she stayed till the war was over.

"I worked hard, like a slave, it nearly killed me, but I kept my dignity, no one will tell you I didn't," she said, stretching out her hands to prove it. Those were coarse hands, the hands of a manual worker who had done all kinds of hard work, that left no trace of softness on them.

When the war was over, she returned to Lublin. She knew there was nothing to go back to, but what else could she do?

When Shavuot came, she went to the synagogue. After the Holocaust she had her problems with God, but going to the synagogue was more than a religious matter, it was a symbol.

Besides, "It was an opportunity to meet most of the Lublin Jewish survivors," she explained. Even people who were not religious came to the synagogue to meet the others, to be together, and to find as many details as they could about the fate of their beloved ones.
